The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, JANUARY, 22, 1870.

THE COMMONERS OF BERKHAMPTSTEAD have won a victory, but the fruits of it will scarcely satisfy their expectations. All that they have obtained by the decree of the Master of the Rolls is a declaration that the freehold and copyhold tenants of Berkhamptstead Manor, inclusive of Northchurch, otherwise Berkhamptstead St. Mary, are entitled to common of pasture and other commonable rights over the waste of the manor, including that portion which Earl Brownlow, the defendant in the suit, had taken steps to approve. The case is reported in the current number of the Weekly Reporter. The right, which was asserted for the tenants of the manor, to treat the whole common as a recreation-ground, was probably the main object of the suit, and has not been established, the evidence in support of it being entirely of modern date, and consequently insufficient ground on which to rest a claim by prescription. Had this right been successfully asserted on behalf of the tenants of the manor, we may imagine that the right won for them would soon have been practically, though not legally, won for the public.

A public right, in the sense of a legal title on the part of her Majesty's subjects generally, to exercise any liberties on any "common lands," is unknown to the law of England. Whether the time has not arrived for some legislative rearrangement of this matter, through which, whether by purchase or otherwise, some portions of these fast-disappearing commonable lands should not be dedicated to the public at large, may well be asked; but a very slight acquaintance with the history of English real property law will show that those limitations of the rights of the lords which attach to common lands are merely rights personal to the particular commoners in each case. "So excessive is the strictness of this doctrine," said Mr. H. W. Cole, Q.C., in an able paper on the subject which appeared some years ago in Fraser's Magazine, "that grave discussions have arisen as to whether the commoners themselves, who have rights of pasture on the land, are entitled to go on it except for certain defined and special purposes; and if our old law books are to be believed, it has even been adjudged in ancient times that, though a commoner may go on the waste land to take his cattle to pasture, or even to see that the ground is in a fit state for pasture, yet he has no other business there, and will be guilty of trespass if his only object be the idle one of personal recreation. It is said that he may send his calves there to grass, but not his children to play." "Fortunately," continues Mr. Cole, "the common sense of landowners, and their instinct of self-preservation, have kept them from insisting with strictness on rights so extravagant, although our lawyers in ancient times were far too ready to concede their claims without sufficient examination. The intervention of Parliament has, therefore, not yet been felt necessary to correct what would otherwise have been an intolerable evil."

There may, however, by special prescription, be a right on the part of commoners to use the common land of a manor for purposes of recreation, though such right is ex necessitate a right purely personal to themselves, or, rather to their tenements. As, for instance, in the village-green case, Abbot v. Weekly, 1 Levinz. 176, where the Court of King's Bench upheld a prescription to dance upon the green; and in Fitch v. Rawlins, 2 H. Black. 394, where, on an action for trespass for breaking and entering a close belonging to the plaintiff and playing cricket therein, it was held that there might be a good plea of a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to play at all manner of lawful games in the close of A., at all seasonable times of the year, whereas a plea of a custom for all persons not being inhabitants would have been void for generality. In point of fact, as Buller, J., remarked, that cannot be a custom which may be claimed by all the people of England, and is common to all mankind. If there be such a right, it is by the common law (as in the familiar case of a highway), and not by custom (Co. Litt. 110 b). The right, moreover, if such there be, must be exercised at reasonable times. In Bell v. Wardell (Willes, 202), a plea of a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to walk and ride over a close in private ownership, was held to be no defence to an action of trespass for walking and riding over the close while the corn was standing. The Scotch and English law, in this respect, are identical. See Dyce v. Lady James Hay, 1 Macq. 305, and Arlott v. Ellis, 7 B. & C. 346. A right of way for the public across a tract does not necessarily confer the right of diverging therefrom, and wandering over or resting upon the tract itself.

In short, what are called the "rights of the public" in the matter appear to be moral rather than legal rights. The need on which they are grounded may have been small in the middle ages, and yet that fact is perfectly compatible with its being urgent in the second half of the nineteenth century. However strictly the law may in old times have denied in theory the existence of any public privilege, in practice there was an amount of actual freedom sufficient for the needs of a thinner population inhabiting a country of fewer enclosures. Since then cultivation has swallowed up thousand after thousand of acres until the few remaining wastes, which once were as a drop in a bucket compared with their similar environments, possess an enhanced value in the eyes of the lords of manors, who thereby become inclined to narrow to their strict legal dimensions, all rights operating in restriction of their own; while, simultaneously with this enhancement of the value to the lord of the manor, railway travelling has increased ten thousand fold the amount of injury which he is capable of sustaining from a liberty on the part of the public; and the crowding together of population in large towns has increased the necessity that the public should in practice possess such a liberty.

This appears most clearly in the case of open spaces in the neighbourhood of London and other large cities. And in these cases, too, is illustrated the fact that the commoners' rights are insufficient to secure the preservation of those open spaces. At present the public, though vitally interested in their preservation, are powerless to interfere by any civil process directed against the encroachment on or unlawful "improvement" of a waste; the right to complain in a court of law or equity is vested solely in the commoners of the waste, who may be ill-qualified or even unwilling to resist. Mr. Augustus Smith has earned the thanks of everyone interested in the fate of the "commons" of the realm, for the vigour and public spirit with which he has fought and won the battle of the Berkhamptstead commoners; and it is another strong illustration of the drift of our previous remarks, that the battle which Mr. Smith has fought, has been that of these commoners and not that of the public.

cate to Mr. Henry Lovibond, a Bridgewater solicitor. The Lord Chief Justice, in the course of his judgment, censured very strongly the manner in which the commissioners, more especially Mr. Chisholm Anstey, conducted the examination of the witness. We approve entirely of this censure, for although the commissioners might despise the witness, that was no reason for bullying him or asking him utterly irrelevant and even incomprehensible questions. It may be remembered that the commissioners declined to examine Mr. Lovibond, after announcing to him that they intended to refuse his certificate; they allowed him, however, to make a statement, and it is now decided that this must be regarded as the statement of a witness. As the Attorney-General has announced that he shall now enter a nolle prosequi to the indictments pending against Mr. Lovibond, the matter will probably now drop, unless, indeed, the Commissioners should think fit to carry the case to a court of error.

As to Mr. Lovibond, he has escaped the penalty by confessing himself guilty. His own evidence convicted him of bribery, which may render him a fit subject for contempt, but not for persecution.

TWO RULES NISI have been obtained in the Common Pleas, to review taxation of costs under the following circumstances:—

In the first case the action was against the Brighton Railway Company to recover compensation for personal injuries sustained in the accident last summer at New Cross. The railway company admitted their liability, and the damages were assessed before the Secondary of London, and a verdict found for the plaintiff for £180. The plaintiff in due course delivered his bill of costs, and on taxation the Master allowed two fair copies of brief, &c., fees to both leading and junior counsel, and twelve guineas for "a good jury." It was contended that on a writ of inquiry the expenses of only one counsel should be allowed. The practice we believe is not uniform, as in the Common Pleas and Exchequer two counsel are generally allowed in such cases, and in the Queen's Bench only one. As it was thought advisable that some general rule should be established for the guidance of the Masters on this point, the application for a rule nisi was granted. It is to be hoped, however, that the Court will not lay down any rigid rule either way, for it would surely be better to leave the matter in the Masters' discretion in each particular case. In some cases of assessing damages two counsel are quite unnecessary, in others it would be very difficult to do with less, even though the sum ultimately awarded be not large. No better instance of this can be given than such cases as the present, where the nicest questions frequently arise out of the medical evidence, as to whether the injuries caused by the railway accident are permanent or not, and whether the symptoms observed are referable to the shock caused by it, or to other disease. The allowance of these fees is of course a matter of considerable importance to the Brighton Railway Company, owing to the immense number of claims arising out of the same accident, and assessed in the same way. A "good" jury is obtained, not as a special jury by side-bar rule, but by summons, and it may be that the costs of such a jury ought not to be allowed, because when the summons was granted the judge had no means of knowing whether the case was proper to be tried by a good jury or not, and there was no subsequent granting of a certificate as in the case of a special jury. The fees to a good jury vary, and are in most places much less than a guinea a head.

In the second case a Mr. Sinclair sued the Great Eastern Railway Company, whose engineer he had long been, for matters extending over ten years, involving eighteen distinct claims and many points of law. The action was referred to an eminent Queen's Counsel, who had awarded Mr. Sinclair upwards of £28,000. On taxation the Master, who considered himself bound by a rule to that effect, disallowed the fees to the plaintiff's leading counsel, and only allowed the ordinary fee to a junior;

he also disallowed Queen's Counsel's fees to the arbitrator. If there be such a rule as the Master thought himself bound by, we suppose it is founded on Hankins v. Rigby, 29 L. J. C. P. 229. But arbitrations now involve far greater sums of money than formerly, and there are many instances in which no human being could say that the case could be properly conducted before the arbitrator by one counsel only. The master should inquire into the nature of the case, and allow the fees accordingly. In these days of heavy arbitrations a hard-and-fast rule to allow for only one counsel in all cases is an absurdity, and no such rule is followed in the Queen's Bench or in the Exchequer.

THE APPEAL FROM THE DECISION of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Re The Heyford Iron Works, Forbes & Judd's cases, 18 W. R. 226, was heard on Tuesday by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Giffard, and was dismissed without hearing the counsel for the respondents, the Court being of opinion that the case was distinguishable from Pell's case, 18 W. R. 31, and Drummond's case, 18 W. R. 2, and was really the same as Migotti's case, L. R. 4 Eq. 238. The distinction appears to be this—that in Pell's case the fully paid-up shares were taken by him directly from the company in payment for property handed over by him to the company in pursuance of an agreement which was not impeached; whereas in the cases of Messrs. Forbes and Judd, they took the fully paid-up shares from Mr. Pell, not from the company. This made the case equivalent to Migotti's case, which the Court of Appeal distinctly approved. The Master of the Rolls, it may be remembered, thought this distinction too fine.

ACCORDING TO THE City Press, the Solicitors' Journal lately, in setting forth "seven distinct classes of females who may trade in their own right in the metropolis," has committed itself to a "vague statement" calculated to "mislead innocent parties" by stating one of such classes to be "the wives of parties resident in London." It is very possible that many Londoners (we use the term in its widest sense) after reading our contemporary's paragraph, will carry away with them the belief that the "custom of London" as to the separate trading of married women is of far wider scope than it really is, imagining that they have our authority for believing so. We must, therefore, point out that we have made no such statement as that attributed to us. The misconception has probably arisen from an incorrect quotation or imperfect comprehension of a portion of an article recently published by us on the separate trading of married women generally (ante p. 170). We commenced by enumerating seven cases in which a married woman may carry on a trade or business; the enumeration extending over the whole range of English law and not being restricted to trading "in the metropolis." For instance, (1) as the agent of her husband; (2) where the husband is civilitur mortuus; (3) under a protection-order obtained pursuant to 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85. The third case was that of a married woman trading within the city of London. The reader who perused the recapitulation in question will be in no danger of mistaking this short note of the existence of a custom for a statement of what the custom is in detail.

In the Liber Albus the custom is set out as follows:—

"Where a feme, covert of a husband, useth any craft in the said city on her sole account, whereof the husband meddeth nothing, such a woman shall be charged as a feme sole concerning everything that toucheth the craft, and if the husband and wife be impleaded, in such a case the wife shall plead as a feme sole; and if she be condemned she shall be committed to prison until she has made satisfaction, and the husband and his goods shall not, in such a case, be charged or impeached."

This procedure can only be adopted in the City courts, though under certain circumstances the custom may be pleaded in the Superior Courts at Westminster; and on an action against the wife, the husband must be joined, although if judgment be given against them, execution will only go against the wife or her goods (Beard v. Webb, 3 B. & P. 93). It appears also (Bacon's Abr., Tit. Custom) that to be within the custom the woman must be the wife of a freeman. This requirement is not mentioned in many of the cases on the subject; it would probably be assumed without mention that this custom of a city related only to the wives of citizens, i.e., of freemen of the City.

Paragraphs are copied from one newspaper into another ad infinitum; we therefore make these remarks on a plain subject, to remove any possibility of further misapprehension. That there should have been any misapprehension at all, is an instance of the errors to which writers are liable when they separate a passage from its context, more especially when the subject is unfamiliar.

THE LAST MAIL FROM INDIA brings a rumour of a reduction, which is contemplated, in the number of the judges of the Indian High Courts, the total number of whom will be reduced by eight. Whether this reduction will impair the efficiency of the Indian High Courts or not it is difficult to foresee. The present number of High Court judges is, except in Bengal, by no means near the maximum limit enforced by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104. Indeed, very soon after the High Courts were constituted by that Act it became necessary to increase the numerical strength of the Bench. By the 1st section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104, the Act for establishing High Courts of Judicature in India, her Majesty was empowered by letters patent to establish High Courts at Fort William in Bengal, at Madras and Bombay. By the 2nd section these high courts are respectively to consist of a chief justice and not more than fifteen judges selected from such persons as in the section mentioned. By the 16th section her Majesty is empowered to establish a High Court in and for any portion of her Majesty's dominions in India not included within the limits of the local jurisdiction of another High Court, to consist of a chief justice and such number of other judges as may be expedient. Under this last section High Courts have been established for the north western provinces.

In the presidency of Bengal, although originally little more than two-thirds of that number were appointed, there are now thirteen judges of the High Court.

As to the other presidencies Bombay will serve as an example. There, although the Act was passed in August, 1861, the High Court was not erected until the 26th day of June, 1862, when letters patent were issued for that purpose, and the court was ordained to consist, until further provision, of a chief justice and six judges, but the number was, on the 6th of July, 1863, increased to a chief justice and seven judges. Considering the multifarious jurisdiction of the High Court at Bombay the present number of judges does not seem too great, and perhaps the same may be said of the High Courts at Calcutta. Of course the motive of the reduction is economy, but economy at the expense of efficiency is not to be thought of in legal matters.

THE DIRECTORS of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company among other reasons for not paying a dividend, state, apropos of their costly New Cross accident, that a class of men has sprung up in the legal and medical professions, who make a trade of railway accidents and initiate and foster expensive litigation, making the system one of organised extortion. We have no intention of denying that gross claims are too often made, and with too much success, upon railway companies; but we do not know that the class who foster expensive litigation in the way above-mentioned are any worse than the medical men occasionally appearing as having been employed by railway companies to visit presumptive claimants and cajole them into a compromise.

OUR LAWYERS.

A foreigner, after glancing over the correspondence columns of our last few issues, would perhaps imagine the attorneys and solicitors' side of the legal profession to be in the winter of their discontent at their professional position. One murmur, however, does not make such a figurative winter, any more than one swallow makes an actual summer; and there is little hardihood in asserting that the mass of both branches of the law are perfectly content to remain in their present positions relatively to each other. Certainly one or two of the "murmurs" which we have been the means of transmitting to the world have passed considerably beyond the limits of a gentle susurrus. The topic of "amalgamation" between bar and solicitor is not a new one, but some of our late correspondents have introduced into it a new element which, to borrow a well-known Hibernicism, we are sorry to welcome. They write in a spirit of grumbling hostility to the bar, which, we are happy to say, is new to the amalgamation controversy. Hitherto it has been one of the attributes of the present system that bar and solicitors have co-operated with cordiality; indeed, the moment the two branches ceased to meet each other cordially in the discharge of their separate but kindred functions it would be no longer possible for them to get through their joint labours. We can discern no causes which should tend to disturb such cordiality, and have not as yet observed anything leading us to conclude that it has ceased to be the sentiment of each branch towards the other. The tone adopted by some of our late correspondents indicates of itself that they are advancing a position not shared by their professional brethren.

One gentleman speaks of the bar as "delighting to run down" the other branch, an assertion which it is needless to refute. We notice it, however, because we regard it as underlying an idea, not common, but which we have heard broached, that solicitors are regarded with strong aversion by the public generally, and that this is attributable to their position relative to the bar. In the first place the unpopularity of lawyers may be, and often is, excessively exaggerated. There are many stock jokes about the lawyer's cunning, his rapacity, his readiness to pocket his six-and-eightpence or his guinea as the case may be, but no one would seriously advance their existence as a proof that lawyers are held in low public estimation. A joke against a lawyer made in a drama will often "bring down the house;" all these things prove simply that the English nation likes its jokes, and the lawyers are good tempered enough not to mind them. Parsons and doctors and scores of others come in for similar witticisms, but we should no sooner think of attaching any serious weight to such a phenomenon than of arguing, on the strength of a certain employment of the word "cabbage," that dishonesty is popularly attributed to tailors. We glance frequently over the pages of various medical journals, but we do not find that the "general practitioners" take to heart the popular witticisms which describe them as making fortunes out of bread pills. Granted that lawyers are grumbled at more than those who purvey other wares to the public, the fact does not prove that the public holds lawyers in low estimation; it arises from the dislike which people have to paying money for no tangible or immediate advantage. If a man buys a coat, he has before him, or rather on his back, that for which he paid his money. Even that grand inquisitor, the dentist, does something tangible for his money, while the lawyer has done in nine cases out of ten nothing which the client can understand. People grumble at there being any law business which they cannot transact for themselves; add to this that no litigant ever believes that the failure of his case has been due to its own weakness, and you have accounted for an amount of grumbling which may sound loud but which means very little. The lawyer who hears most of it is ex necessitate, the one with whom the litigant comes into direct contact, the solicitor; and finding that his clients, by trusting and employing him, show that they continue to regard him as a man of integrity, he passes it by with at most a good-humoured shrug. It has probably occurred to but few solicitors to take it to heart and ascribe it to a degraded social position attributable to exclusion from advocacy in the superior courts.

So far as the interests of the sister branches are concerned, the question now raised lies between a complete fusion, or none. Mr. Saunders, in his paper, lately printed by us, while arguing that attorneys should be permitted to argue in the superior courts and barristers allowed to see original clients, seems, if we understand him rightly, to treat the matter as total gain to the solicitors and a total loss to the bar. But such an alteration, if made, would result in simply this—that solicitor and counsel would be one; all barristers would be solicitors, and all solicitors would be barristers.

The real question is, whether it is to the interest of the public that there should be this amalgamation. Would the work be better done if the distinction were abolished? There is an a priori consideration, which, so far as it goes, is a reason in favour of the present system, and that arises from the fact that we as a nation have gravitated into separation of lawyers into counsel and solicitors. The present system is the result of no one legislative enactment; it took place silently and gradually in the course of practice, and that the separation should have so taken place is a strong reason for conceiving that it was found to be practically convenient.

Quitting the a priori consideration, the present separation of functions is convenient as a division of labour, and this is, and is conceded to be, the backbone of the question. As to this, the distinction at present is not only between the solicitor and the advocate—between the producer of the case and the mouthpiece by which it is to be hurled at judge or jury; the distinction between the expert in the theory of law and the expert in the details of its practice, is still more important. No man can be both, and be advocate as well. It is said that after amalgamation, there will still be this division of labour, by means of what may be called the partnership system, which really amounts to saying that the same want will be provided for in a less definite and more irregular way. Why then take away the present provision? Nor can we see our way to believing that under what may be called the system of partnerships, the work would be as well done as now. As is now the case in America, there would be in each firm a member doing the work which the solicitor, town or country, does now; and there would be also the theory-of-law member who would argue points of law, and advise upon theoretical questions; possibly, many firms would also possess the advocate member, devoting his attention to cases in which mere rhetoric was relied on to gain a verdict. It seems to us that the clients' interests stand a far better chance now, when the solicitor, after taking his instructions personally, can go into the open bar-market and employ whom he thinks most trustworthy to advise or to argue, than they would stand if, as would practically be the case, it were a matter of course that after Mr. A., whom we may call the solicitor partner, had had his conversations with the client, Mr. B., the other partner, should be entrusted with the brief or the case for opinion.

As to the argument that cases would be best argued by lawyers who had been in personal communication with the client, we demur to it unreservedly. In the first place, while days contain only twenty-four hours a-piece, it is quite one man's business to see clients, gently repress their prolixity, and extract from them the material to be worked upon, and quite another's to work up that material into an argument or an opinion. In the second place, we believe it to be a great mistake to suppose that it is an advantage to the advocate to have a personal knowledge of his client's case. He should know and appreciate, not all that there is to be known about the circumstances, but all that will be weighed by the Court or jury. As long as there are rules of evidence, there will be in every case, that by which the mind of the client himself or his partisan, or even anyone merely interested from personal contact with the facts, will be coloured, more or less unconsciously, but which is no part of the "case" as judge or jury will view it, and which the unsympathetic advocate, unbiassed by any such contact, has no difficulty in at once disregarding. The same to a lesser degree applies to cases for advice. We grant that there are occasionally cases in which an interview between counsel and the lay client is advisable; but in such cases there can always be, and usually is, a conference between the three.

America is cited as an instance of the success of the proposed amalgamation, but if our readers read as many American law newspapers as we do they would not incline to lay much stress on this instance. It is true the partnership system works there, but the results are inferior to our own. American lawyers do many things which are not done over here; for instance they advertise themselves in the newspapers, though we do not say that that results directly from the partnership system. The relation between the English bar and their clients is a singular one, but it is one which has worked well, and there is no reason why it should not continue to do so.

The land-law of the sister island is just now a popular topic, but the reader who anticipates from the present article an entertaining discussion garnished with any of the popular shibboleths will be sadly disappointed. We are only going to draw attention to an Irish litigation of a singularly unfortunate description—quite as important as anything that has been printed for the last six months on fixity of tenure or the reverse.

Some time since there appeared in the Irish papers a letter from a Mr. Newton, the solicitor or agent of the Earl of Lanesborough, headed "The Magic of Red Paint." The story told in that letter may be shortly stated as follows:—Some time since a Mr. Tottenham's estate was sold in the Landed Estates Court, and a Mrs. Reilly purchased lot 28. This lot was accurately described as to abutments, and otherwise, in the particulars of sale, and rightly stated to contain 16a. 3r. 26p. Abutting on this lot was a piece of waste ground belonging to Lord Lanesborough, containing about 1r. 21p., which was, however, of some value for frontage, as it abutted on the public street of the town of Newtown-butler. The map attached, and the rental published by the court, and which are submitted to the inspection of adjoining owners, rightly showed Lord Lanesborough's boundary, and that being so, his agents troubled themselves no more about it. The conveyance to Mrs. Reilly rightly described the parcels as containing 16a. 3r. 26p., and it was not disputed that she bid and paid for this quantity, and no more. By a mistake, however, of the draftsman employed by the Board of Works to prepare the map attached to this deed (which forms part of the description of the parcels), the red colour, which was used to specify the land conveyed, was extended over the 1r. 21p. of Lord Lanesborough's land, so that while the body of the deed described the parcels as containing 16a. 3r. 26p., the map showed them as containing 17a. 1r. 7p.

Some two years after the date of the conveyance to her Mrs. Reilly took possession of and attempted to enclose this extra piece of land, whereupon Lord Lanesborough brought an action of trespass against her, but at the trial Monahan, C.J., directed the jury that the map was conclusive evidence of what had been sold by the Landed Estates Court, and that the defendant had a Parliamentary title to this disputed land; and this ruling was upheld by the Court of Common Pleas.

Lord Lanesborough thereupon applied to the Landed Estates Court itself to correct its own error, and reform its conveyance by taking away from Mrs. Reilly that which it had never meant to give her, and she had never intended to purchase; and Lynch, J., thereupon made an order directing Mrs. Reilly to bring the deed into court to be reformed, and to convey the extra piece of land back to Lord Lanesborough; but on appeal this order was reversed.

We confess that when we read this story in the papers we had some doubts whether the writer had not kept back some facts, which might have seemed to him not to be material, upon which the Court might have found negligence or acquiescence on the part of Lord Lanesborough, or some other special ground for sustaining the map in question; and we waited, with some anxiety, to hear the other side of the case. The case has, however, been reported in the current number of the Irish Reports,* and it appears from the report that the writer told "an over true tale," and the extra information afforded by the report seems to us to make this travesty of justice even more glaring.

It appears that neither Mrs. Reilly nor her solicitor had the least idea that the premises in question were being conveyed to her, and that she did not find it out till nearly two years after the date of the sale, and that the error, such as it was, was the error of the officers of the court, and of them only. The order of the court below, indeed, recited that the carriage of procuring the map had been intrusted to her, but the Court of Appeal refused to give credit to this recital, stigmatising it as a gross breach of duty on the part of the Court, if true, and stating that it did not appear to be founded on fact. But then their Lordships went out of their way to declare their opinions, not only that there had been no fraud on the part of the purchaser, which seems to have been proved, but that there were no circumstances connected with the case entitling Lord Lanesborough, as against the purchaser, to relief in a Court of Equity, a point on which we beg most distinctly to differ from their Lordships.

The judgment of Lord Chancellor O'Hagan went so far as this, that no matter under what circumstances a purchaser has, without personal fraud or express trust, obtained a conveyance from the Landed Estates Court, no equity can exist to fasten a trust upon that purchaser's conscience; and though Lord Justice Christian does not lay down the law quite so broadly as this, what he does say is equally opposed as well to natural justice as to the recognised doctrines of our Courts of Equity. The judgment of the learned Lord Justice is very Irish; it is throughout a furious indictment of the Act constituting the court, which he describes as "a special tribunal, with power hitherto unknown to the law, and especially shocking to the prepossessions of the British jurist." The measure itself he characterises as "prodigious," and quotes, with evident approbation, the opinions of those who describe it as "revolution—confiscation—a new Cromwellian settlement—experimentum in corpore vili—insult, which no Government could dare to offer to any other part of the Empire, nor even to this, if men of might or authority were in its high places;" and he then, as if expressly for the purpose of exposing the Act to odium, proceeds, as it seems to us, to push it to a length, certainly not required, probably not even warranted, by its terms. This purpose indeed, seems not indistinctly shadowed forth in the concluding words of the introduction to his judgment. After the passage to which we have already referred his Lordship states shortly the history of the legislation on the subject, and then proceeds in these words:—"To apply to cases of individual grievance, wrought in the working of such an engine as I have sketched, sentiments and language which might have been appropriate if confiscation had not been legalized, and to do so for the sake of setting up a jurisdiction for the redress of such grievances, though the distinctive policy of the measure required that, if unhappily permitted to occur, they should be absolutely irremediable, is simply to blind oneself alike to the legislation and to the history of the period.

"The present case brings out in strong relief the features of what I have ventured to designate as legalised confiscation."

After stating the facts of the case to the effect already mentioned, his Lordship proceeds: "Under these circumstances two questions present themselves; one of great magnitude—the other comparatively a small one. The first is this. Is it within the competency of any Court of Equity in the Empire, up to the House of Lords, to oblige the purchaser to part with what the judgment of the Common Pleas tells us her conveyance has vested in her; and to do so upon the ground of mistake or miscarriage in the Estates Court proceedings which led up to that conveyance? The second and lesser question is: supposing the first to be answered in the affirmative, is the Estates Court itself one of those to which such jurisdiction belongs?" and after a most careful examination of the well-known case of Errington v. Rorke (7 H. L. 617), he answers both the questions in the negative; the first "with reserve;" the other, on which he says he "desires to rest his judgment," with confidence.

We venture to submit, with unfeigned respect for so high an authority, that this last is the only portion of these proceedings which is sustainable in principle, or governed by decision. It cannot, we think, be denied that the decision of the same court in Re Walsh's Estate (15 W. R. 1115, I. R. 1 Eq. 399) is completely on all fours with this case; and we are not disposed in any manner to cavil at that decision. That, however, goes no farther than this; that once the Landed Estate Court has executed and issued the conveyance it is functus officio in respect of the land, and can no more recall and amend its conveyance, however inaccurate, than any other grantor could do of his own unsupported authority, if he had unwittingly put his hand to a larger grant than he had intended. In Re Collis's Estate (14 Ir. Ch. 511) seems to show that so long as the deed remains in the possession of the court, not actually delivered over to the purchaser, the court retains jurisdiction to rectify it; and in Re Gould (2 Ir. Jur. N. S. 387) contains a dictum of Chief Commissioner Martley to the same effect. But it may now be taken as settled, in the words of the late Baron Greene,* that "so long as the process of selling is in fieri their jurisdiction, (i. e.,—of judges of this court) exists; but the moment that process is ended by the conveyance, they are functi officio." We agree, therefore, that Judge Lynch had no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from, and that the Court of Appeal was bound to discharge it; and this whether the policy of establishing this court was, as the Lord Chancellor seems to think, "wise and beneficial," or, as the Lord Justice not obscurely intimates, "a mistake and an anachronism"—"a wholly indefensible anomaly," one of the worst instances of confiscation that has ever disgraced British legislation, "even for Ireland."

But when we have said this, we have said all that we can in favour of this case; it seems to us to have miscarried in every other particular. Of the morale of the question, as regards the conduct of the purchaser, we need hardly speak; it will be sufficient to quote the following passage from the judgment of Lynch J., which seems to us to disclose the true ground on which this case is distinguishable from all the cases which have preceded it. His Honour says†:—"Mrs. Reilly being herself in possession of the property purchased, no act was required to be done beyond executing the conveyance, and, therefore, no act was done that could be the least notice to Lord Lanesborough of the fact that part of his estate was wrongly conveyed with a Parliamentary title binding him. Mrs. Reilly, by her own account, found subsequently that her map, in excess of the property purchased, gave her a bit of the adjoining estate. She pretends no honest right to this property; she does not even insinuate that she ever believed that it was right for her to get it. Instead of honestly asking herself—"What right have I to get and keep my neighbour's property," she goes to a lawyer to be advised if she can keep property filched from an adjoining owner by the oversight of the officer who made a mere scrivenerly mistake in carrying out the contract of the completion, of which her solicitor had the carriage."

* I. R. 3 Eq. 523.

† I. R., 2 Eq. 381.

These facts—and they are not denied or explained—would, we think, be amply sufficient to show that a bill to have the purchaser declared a trustee of this land for the deprived owner, and for a conveyance thereof to him, would lie, and ought to be successful; so that, if Lord Lanesborough had taken, or were now to take, that course, the Court of Chancery would be found both able and willing to redress the wrong. Of course, in the face of the dicta contained in the judgments delivered in this case, Lord Lanesborough could not be advised to file such a bill, unless he was determined, if necessary, to carry the case to the House of Lords.

The distinction between this case and that of Errington v. Rorke, the late case of Power v. Reeves (10 H. L. 645), and the other cases in which an innocent owner has, without any negligence on his part, been deprived of his property by the error, haste, or carelessness, of the Encumbered Estates Commissioners or their subordinates, (and we have known of several such cases, though none where the error was of any great magnitude,) lies in this—that in all the prior cases the case of the purchaser was as completely bonâ fide as that of the owner, and thus the very case arose to which the Act was intended to apply—viz., a bonâ fide purchase of a bad title for valuable consideration without notice. The very object of the Act was to make such titles good, and we agree that, although the mistake in his case bore far more oppressively on the defendant in Errington v. Rorke than the mistake here does on Lord Lanesborough, he was utterly without redress; because Errington had bonâ fide bought and paid for, and obtained a statutory conveyance of, his land without notice of his claim. How does that apply to a case where the purchaser never bought or paid for the land at all? If, indeed, Mrs. Reilly had sold this land to a bonâ fide purchaser without notice a different question would have arisen, but how any man, above all any man so conversant with equity as Lord Justice Christian, could suppose that any Court of Equity would hesitate, if not to rectify the conveyance on the ground of mistake, at any rate to fix her with a trust for the true owner, passes our comprehension. We grant that there was (at least, except in persisting in such a claim) no fraud, legal or moral, in the case; but mistake is just as good a ground of equity as fraud, and in this case the mistake was admitted, and was—what did not exist in any of the cases relied on—common to all the parties.

But further, we cannot help thinking that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was wrong in the first instance. But this leads us into a somewhat lengthy discussion, which we must reserve till next week.

THE BANKRUPTCY RULES.

III.

It remains for us this week to deal with that portion of the new rules which deals with the two kindred subjects of Liquidation by Arrangement and Composition. These two modes of settling matters between a man and his creditors are essentially distinct in character, a broad distinction between them being that the first is only a mode of carrying into effect the leading principles of the Bankruptcy Laws, though without many of the consequences of actual Bankruptcy; while the second is an entire departure from all the principles forming the basis of the Bankruptcy system. It has followed that whenever, under any name, the plan now called Liquidation by Arrangement has been tried, whenever that is to say, there has been a complete cessio bonorum on the part of the debtor, the property to be distributed among his creditors as in Bankruptcy, no great difficulty has been found in the working. But, as most of our readers know but too well, the working of any system of composition arrangements has hitherto been extremely difficult in execution and eminently unsatisfactory in result. We greatly fear that the provisions of the new Act will meet with pretty much the same fate as their predecessors.

Our readers are no doubt acquainted with the scheme of liquidation by arrangement, the outline of which was sketched out by the Act. It provided that, instead of being necessarily thrown into the Court of Bankruptcy, an insolvent debtor might call a meeting of his creditors, at which, by special resolution, it might be resolved to liquidate his affairs by arrangement, a special resolution being a resolution supported by a majority in number and three fourths in value of the creditors present, personally or by proxy, at the meeting, creditors for not more than ten pounds being counted in estimating the majority in value but not the majority in number. A trustee and inspector might likewise be appointed. The resolution and a statement of assets and liabilities were to be registered, the registrar having first satisfied himself that all had been done duly as the law required. The property was thereupon to be distributed in the same way, and the trustee to have the same powers, as in bankruptcy. But no discharge of the debtor is to follow as of course from these proceedings; it can only be granted by a further special resolution of the creditors. This is, in short, a bankruptcy without a discharge of the debtor, except by the will of the creditors. Such a system in the hands of hostile creditors would probably prove decidedly less favourable to a debtor than an ordinary bankruptcy, while in the hands of easy and friendly creditors it would be very apt to be otherwise. Everything therefore depends upon the constitution of the meeting of creditors by which the necessary special resolutions are to be passed,—that is the key to the whole position; for the majority by which everything is to be decided is to be of the creditors present or represented, not of the whole body of creditors. It is as to this point that everybody will look with most anxiety to the Rules. The effect of the Rules upon this subject is this:—The proceedings are to commence by the debtors' filing a petition for liquidation in the Court which would have had jurisdiction over him in case of bankruptcy. A general meeting is to be held within a month, to be summoned in a special way. The debtor is to deliver to the registrar a written request to issue the notices together with the notices themselves which are to be issued. He must also deliver a list of creditors; and the registrar is to take care that this list and the notices correspond, and then to issue the notices by post fourteen days before the meeting. Notice is also to be published in the Gazette. There is provision made for rectifying the list if any omission has occurred; but we find no provision requiring the list to be sworn to by the debtor, nor any provision for remedying any injustice done if a creditor be omitted from the list, and so have no opportunity of being heard till after the first general meeting. By sec. 127 of the Act the registration of a special resolution is, in the absence of fraud, to be conclusive evidence of all the statutory requisites having been complied with. Nothing but experience can decide positively whether these provisions are sufficient to prevent the packing of the first meeting of creditors by omitting to give notice to some of the creditors. But probably in the case of liquidation, where the whole property is to be distributed, and the chance of any benefit to the bankrupt and therefore the temptation to fraud, so slight, they may prove to be so.

A far more serious matter has to be dealt with when we come to composition arrangements. Composition deeds, the litigation to which they have given rise, and the frauds perpetrated under cover of them, have been the opprobrium of the Bankrupt Laws hitherto in force. Now, for the first time, we are in a position to form some idea as to how far the new system will remedy these evils. The matter has of course to be looked to the more closely, because a composition arrangement is the hope of every fraudulent or reckless debtor; and the inducements to fraud, and the probability that frauds will be attempted in respect to composition arrangements, are enormously strong.

Under the system in force until the beginning of the year, such arrangements were made by deed, which deed was to be assented to by a fixed majority in number and value of all the creditors, and then registered and Gazetted. It thereupon became binding upon all creditors. No creditor could effectually assent till he had proved his debt, and with the deed a list of creditors had to be deposited. But the fatal vice of the system lay in the privacy of the proceedings. Up to the moment of registration no publicity was provided for. The assents of creditors might be obtained, and, in fact, we believe almost always were obtained singly and in private; there was no opportunity for concerted action, no means by which creditors opposed to the arrangement could make their voice heard against it, or test its bond fides. There was no provision that they should have any notice of it even after its completion, for, of course, a mere notice in the Gazette is no real notice to ordinary people; and the first that a creditor often heard of a composition deed was finding it pleaded in answer to an action for his debt. This secrecy was probably the main source of all the frauds connected with composition deeds. The vast litigation of which they were the subject turned upon two classes of questions; as to one of which the whole of the litigation might, we think, well have been avoided, while as to the other, it was, we believe, the almost inevitable consequence of the adoption of the composition system. One large class of decided cases has to do with the external conditions to be complied with to give validity to a deed—the assents of creditors, registration, and so on. Another class has to do with the substance, the actual provisions of the deed itself, their equality, reasonableness, and so on.

Under the new system, where a composition arrangement is contemplated, the proceedings will commence with a petition by the debtor, to be presented as in the case of liquidation by arrangement. This is to be followed by the summoning of a general meeting of creditors, the process being the same which we have already described in the case of liquidation. The main difference, so far, between the two processes is that provided by the Act; that in the case of a composition, the resolution adopting it must be first approved by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors at one meeting, and afterwards confirmed by a majority in number and value at another. The request for the first meeting, as in the case of liquidation, must be accompanied by the deposit of a list of creditors, and a list of debts and assets must be produced by the debtor at both the first and second meetings. No one is to be at liberty to vote as a creditor without having proved his debt. The question then is, whether these provisions are sufficient to guard against the class of frauds which were so disgracefully common under the older system. On the whole, we are inclined to think that they will be found far better than the former state of things. It would not be difficult to suggest weak points in the armour, points at which an ingenious and dishonest debtor might find room for fraud; but we think the Rules will practically secure, either that all creditors shall have notice of the meeting at which the composition resolution is to be adopted and confirmed, and so shall have an opportunity of making themselves heard against it; or else that, if any creditors are omitted, they shall not be bound by the arrangement; for only creditors mentioned in the list presented by the debtor at the meeting of creditors will be affected by the composition.

The next defect, as we pointed out, in the old system was the amount of wholly unnecessary litigation upon questions affecting merely the formal requisites of deeds of arrangement. As to this, it is plainly desirable that all questions of such a nature, which are generally questions of fact easily decided by a very little inquiry, should be disposed of once for all at an early stage of the proceedings. The 127th section of the Act enacts that the registration of the extraordinary resolution for the acceptance of a composition shall, in the absence of fraud, be conclusive evidence that the resolution was duly passed, and all the requisitions of the Act in respect of it complied with. But the registrar before registering the resolution is to make inquiry whether it has been duly passed, and may hear any creditor who has given notice of his desire to be heard. Of course, it is of all things the most dangerous to venture a prophecy as to the way in which the courts will construe any provision of an Act of Parliament, and especially a Bankruptcy Act. But probably the result of the section we have quoted will be, that all matters relating to the sufficiency of the assents and all kindred questions will be tried once for all by the registrar, and finally concluded by registration. And, though the registrar's investigations are not likely in general, we fear, to be very profound or searching, and many resolutions will probably be registered which ought not to be so, we believe that this change will be of great service. It is an evil that any irregularity should be allowed, or any provision evaded with impunity. But the risk of this is nothing compared with the scandal of having judges and jurors, and counsel and attorneys, and witnesses spending long days inquiring, at enormous expense, whether the assents of creditors were all right in form, and whether the total debts were a thousand pounds, so as to make the majority sufficient, or a thousand and fifty, so as to invalidate the arrangement; and having this repeated as many times over as there were debts to be sued for.

The other and more serious class of litigation which used to arise under the old Act was upon questions affecting not the form of the arrangement or the mode of entering into it, but the actual terms of the arrangement itself. How, then, will it be with regard to such questions under the new Act? As to this, when we remember the course taken by judges in working the Act of 1861; the infirmities of judgment, of will and of temper which they showed; the narrow, rigid, and actually hostile spirit in which they dealt with the Act for the first few years of its life, and the liberal and friendly spirit with which they afterwards treated it; the studious effort at first to confine its operation within the narrowest possible limits, and afterwards to extend it as widely as possible—when we remember all this we shall certainly not venture to prophesy with any confidence what they may think fit to do with the new Act; we can speak only with much hesitation. Under the Act of 1861 the judges held, and we think rightly, that they could not give effect to a deed as against non-assenting creditors unless it were for the equal benefit of all the creditors. The new Act says merely that the requisite majority may agree to accept a composition in satisfaction of their debts, which agreement shall be binding upon all the creditors named in the debtor's list. If then the judges apply the same reasoning to this Act as to the old Act, they will still insist upon equality. And all the objections on the score of inequality which could arise under the old system will arise under the new. But under the Act of 1861 the judges went further; they insisted that the provisions of a deed should not only be equal, but that they should also be reasonable. After seven or eight years' reflection they found out that this was all nonsense. Now and then the spirit of mischief revived, the recollection of the keen enjoyment they had once found in playing football with Lord Westbury's Act recurred, and some judge again started the notion of unreasonableness. But on the whole the doctrine of reasonableness was rapidly dying, if not absolutely dead, when the act which it concerned was repealed. Will it be revived under the new Act? It is impossible to say. As far as the Act itself is concerned we should be inclined to say, with some confidence, that it would not. But the Rules are a very different matter. The Act merely says that a composition may be accepted in satisfaction. Rule 281 goes further and says that the resolution may provide for embodying the arrangement in a deed with covenants, amongst other things, for protecting and releasing the debtor. Now it is one thing to agree to accept a composition in satisfaction of a debt, and another thing to agree to a composition and release the debtor. If, therefore, this rule be not ultra vires, it goes far beyond the Act. But we would refer especially to rule 287. By that rule if a compounding debtor be indebted severally, and also jointly with some one else, the statutory majority is to be a majority of the whole of the joint and several debtors taken together; but the terms agreed to as to the joint and several debts need not be the same; they may provide for a composition on the separate debts and leave the joint debts unaffected. If this be taken without qualification, there is nothing to prevent a majority composed wholly of joint creditors arranging that a composition of a shilling in the pound shall be paid to the separate creditors, while their own joint debts remain unaffected. How is it possible then to avoid inquiring into the reasonableness or propriety of the arrangement come to?

On the whole it seems to us that there is likely to arise as much litigation upon the composition clause of the new Act as there was upon section 192 of the previous Act. But as we have said, much depends upon the spirit in which the judges are found to deal with the new Act, which, after the experience of the last eight years, we dare not attempt to foretell.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

GROUND FOR WINDING-UP.

Re European Assurance Company, V.C.J., 18 W. R. 9.

We commented on this case so fully at the date of the judgment (13 S. J. 996), that we now need only recapitulate the main features of the decision, which is an instructive one as to shareholders' petitions to wind up.

Imprimis there is a minor point not noticed in the reports which deserves a passing notice. The case decides that where the deed of settlement of a company contains a proviso that the company shall not seek to dissolve itself till certain meetings shall have been held, even a shareholder who has actually executed the deed is not precluded from seeking the aid of the general law before the proceedings in question have been taken. Therefore if articles of association contain a similar provision, any shareholder, even a promoter who signed the articles, may yet present a winding-up petition without waiting for any meetings. But we apprehend that a petition by the company would be premature.

The Court may by section 79 of the Act of 1862, wind up any company when the company has been proved "unable to pay its debts." A company is, by section 80, to be considered unable to pay its debts whenever it has made one of certain specified defaults, or whenever the Court considers that upon the evidence it has been proved unable to pay its debts. In addition to this the company may be wound up whenever the Court considers it "just and equitable" that it should be so. And Spackman's case (1 M.N. & G. 170), rules that this addition means something ejusdem generis with the other tests, and it may be taken to mean the other tests repeated, but with considerable latitude of discretion to dispense with the strictness of their requirements. The word "debts" in the clauses relating to actual defaults refers of course, to debts actually accrued due; "debts" in the general phrase, "unable to pay," includes liabilities of all kinds, whether actually present demands or future or contingent liabilities. And, therefore, in considering whether the evidence shows a company unable to pay its debts, the Court takes every liability of every sort into consideration. In the case of an insurance company, Vice-Chancellor James tells us the Court considers whether or not on that particular day the assets cover those liabilities. But the Court has nothing to do with the direction in which the company's affairs are going: it has nothing to do with the question whether, transacting its business as the company now transacts it, it is likely to be solvent a few months hence; and still less to do with any question as to liabilities under future contracts or policies, which may be anticipated to be undertaken if the course of its business be continued.

In reckoning up the amount of a company's assets the Court will count the uncalled or unpaid capital; and will also, we imagine, be prepared to go into evidence tending to show that the full amount unpaid cannot be realised. The latter view is reasonable; it is not inconsistent with the remarks of Lord Cottenham in Spackman's case, and seems expressly contemplated by Vice-Chancellor James in the case before us. But the Court would probably require conclusive evidence as to shareholders' inability to pay before it would consent to estimate the unpaid capital at less than its nominal figure, and Vice-Chancellor James declined to take any notice of the fact that a recent call had realised only in the proportion of five to seven.

COMMON LAW.

APPEARANCE BY DEFENDANT "IN PERSON"—COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1852, s. 31—APPEARANCE ENTERED BY AGENT NOT AN ATTORNEY—PRACTICE.

Oake and Another v. Moorcroft, Q. B., 18 W. R. 115.

This case decides that an appearance by a defendant "in person" may be entered in the books kept at the Master's office for entering appearances by any agent of the defendant in the defendant's absence, although such agent is not an attorney. Of course the appearance must be in the defendant's name only, as if he had personally entered the appearance himself; the agent's name cannot appear at all.

This decision will doubtless save trouble in many cases to defendants who defend in person; but it is a somewhat dangerous principle to adopt. The theory which regulates the conduct of legal proceedings at present is, that everyone may conduct his own case in person throughout all its stages (criminal proceedings are no exception to this rule, because a criminal proceeding is between the Sovereign and the accused, and not between the prosecutor and the accused); but if he wish to employ an agent, he must engage the services of those who are allowed by law to act as agents in legal proceedings—viz., attorneys or barristers. The reason of the rule is obvious. Without some such provision there would be a number of agents who had given no guarantee of respectability or fitness for their business, and the whole administration of the law would be likely to suffer if it fell into the hands of such unfit persons.

If the principle of Oake v. Moorcroft is followed some serious inconvenience may be the result. If a defendant may enter an appearance "in person" by any agent he chooses, he may also take any other step in the action by the same agent, who might practically have the whole conduct of the action as if he were an attorney, only the agent's name would not appear, but only that of the party to the suit. This would, of course, apply to plaintiffs as well as to defendants, and might, as we have said, become excessively inconvenient.

It is possible that the principle of this decision might be restricted to the case of entering an appearance only, and, if so, no doubt little or no harm is likely to ensue. If, however, the principle is to be thus restricted, was it wise to adopt it at all? There is good ground for thinking that a contrary decision would have been better, although it might have caused inconvenience in that particular case. The safest course is for the officials of the courts to recognise only two classes of persons in the conduct of litigation—viz., the litigants themselves, and the duly authorised attorneys of the litigants.

REVIEWS.

Shelford's Law of Joint-Stock Companies. Containing a Digest of Case Law; the Companies Acts, 1862, 1867, and other Acts Relating to Joint-Stock Companies; the Orders made under those Acts to Regulate Proceedings in the Court of Chancery and County Courts, and Notes of all Cases Interpreting the above Acts and Orders. Second Edition, much enlarged, and bringing the Statutes and Cases down to the date of Publication. By DAVID PITCAIRN, M.A., and FRANCIS LAW LATHAM, B.A., Esqs., Barristers-at-Law. London: Butterworths. 1870.

The former edition of Shelford on Joint-Stock Companies was published six years ago. Since that time the Companies Act, 1867, has supplemented the Act of 1862, and the case law on the subject has been fixed and crystallised by decision after decision to a really extraordinary extent. For instance; the Overend & Gurney and Reese River and other cases have established a sharply defined rule as to the position of duped shareholders with regard to the companies creditors; another class of cases has made intelligible, so far as anything hinging on an absurd section can be made intelligible, the law as between transferors and transferees in face of a winding-up. Grissell v. Bristow, Coles v. Bristow, et id genus omne, have cleared up all questions as between vendors, purchasers, and stock-brokers or jobbers; and an almost countless efflux of decisions has defined rules as to when the Court will or will not compel a winding-up, regulated details of practice as to liquidation, &c., &c. In short since the last edition almost a new law had come into existence. Shelford's Law of Joint-Stock Companies was always considered a useful book, and hence, perhaps, the present new edition. In point of fact, however, the work is little more than nominally a second edition. The editors have had so large a mass of new law to deal with that the result is really the editio princeps of a new work.

The work consists of two parts. First an original account of the law of joint-stock companies, in seven chapters, headed respectively—(1) Formation and incidental matters; (2) Contracts relating to issue of shares; (3) Management; (4) Personal rights and liabilities of directors; (5) Membership, and status, rights, and liabilities of members; (6) Nature of shares as property; (7) Contracts relating to sale and purchase of shares,—with an introduction; and secondly, the Acts of 1862 and 1867, and all forms, orders, and rules (including such county court rules as have been thought relevant). The material rules of the Stock Exchange are given at the end of chapter seven.

It appears that Mr. Latham, who is known to the profession as the author of a very good little work on window lights, was originally engaged in preparing the present edition of Shelford, but leaving for India when his task was scarcely half finished, the work has been completed by Mr. Pitcairn, on whom, therefore, has rested the main burden.

After a careful examination of this work we are bound to say that we know of no other which surpasses it in two all-important attributes of a law book: first, a clear conception on the part of the author of what he intends to do and how he intends to treat his subject; and secondly, a consistent, laborious and intelligent adherence to his proposed order and method. All decisions are noted and epitomised in their proper places, the practice-decisions in the notes to Acts and Rules, and the remainder in the introductory account or digest. In the digest Mr. Pitcairn goes into everything with original research, and nothing seems to escape him. In epitomising the law as to corporate misrepresentations he comes across an old question which has not been raised in the equity courts for many years, and upon which there was some judicial conflict. We mean the question how far misrepresentations published in reports, which, nominally, at any rate, are addressed to the members of the company alone, can be made a ground for avoiding his share contract by a person who, in point of fact, was entrapped by such misrepresentations? In 1866 we ourselves discussed this point at some length, and as there has been no subsequent decision may refer to our then remarks (10 S. J. 806) as containing an exact account of the result of decision on the subject. Mr. Pitcairn's view coincides with ours—viz., that the party deceived by the report would have a right to treat it as a misrepresentation made to him by the company. But it is material to bear in mind that the late Lord Justice Turner considered, in Nicol's case, 7 W. R. 217 (which was not reversed on this ground), that the mere advertisement of reports in the papers was not to be held a communication of them to the shareholders, a view to which Vice-Chancellor Kindersley reluctantly yielded in Barrett's case (13 W. R. 641). With very great deference to the late Lord Justice we cannot for our part subscribe to his view; the fact of his having declared it is, however, a thing to be noted. The reader may accordingly note this at p. 58 of the present work, and he may also note at p. 67, that Stephenson's case (16 W. R. 95) decides that successfully defending an action for calls is not a sufficient "proceeding" before winding-up within the meaning of the principle of Oakes v. Turquand (15 W. R. 1201).

We have added these little notes for the benefit of the reader, and are not to be understood as finding fault with Mr. Pitcairn's digest as imperfect. It is not like too many digests, a mere concatenation of head-notes; on the contrary, the decisions are intelligently epitomised and arranged so as to be, in the words of the preface, "a guide to the practitioner, to enable him to find readily the cases on any particular part of the law," saving him the "unnecessary trouble, so often thrown upon him by text writers, of looking out cases useless to him, which the authors have referred to from some loose analogy, and without notifying their exact bearing." If we might venture an opinion, we should question whether the epitomising has not been pushed a little too far; but we will not assert that this is the case, because the author, having after the labour of analysing deliberately adopted his present plan, is the best judge of its expediency; and when an author has shown great ability in the execution of his work, it is very difficult to say that another method would have been more appropriate. It is enough for us that Mr. Pitcairn's performance is able and exhaustive.

In noting up the practice-decisions to the Acts and Rules the same intelligent care makes itself visible. Thus, to rules 25 and 27 are appended the cases of Re Trent and Humber Shipbuilding Company (17 W. R. 181), Re Herefordshire Banking Company (15 W. R. 1056), &c., by which the first is explained and the second declared ultra vires. Nothing is omitted, and everything is noted at the proper place.

There is an addenda in which the latest cases are noted up, including even the European Assurance Company's Case (18 W. R. 9).

In conclusion, we have great pleasure in recommending this edition to the practitioner. Whoever possesses it, and keeps it noted up, will be armed on all parts and points of the law of joint-stock companies.

COURTS.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Jan. 13th.—In re A. M. Croichest.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 17.

In this case, which was mentioned in the Solicitors' Journal of the 16th inst., Mr. T. Phelps (solicitor), afterwards applied under the 17th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, for the appointment of one of the registrars of the court to take possession of the property of the bankrupt, who had carried on the business of a dealer in fancy goods. He said it was important in the interest of the creditors that the property should be protected until a trustee had been appointed.

The CHIEF JUDGE made an order in the following terms:—"Upon the application of Mr. Phelps, solicitor for a creditor, petitioning for an adjudication of bankruptcy, and upon reading the affidavit of Alfred Ford sworn the 11th January, 1870, filed with the proceedings in this matter, and upon reading the certificate of the court declaring Wm. P. Murray one of the registrars of this court to be the trustee of the property of the said bankrupt: It is ordered that the said Wm. P. Murray do take possession of the said property forthwith."

In these cases it is stated that for the present the registrar will place himself in communication with the official assignee (in London cases), and that the messenger will act under the direction of the official assignee.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 192.

Bagley applied for a week's further time to register this deed of composition, which, upon being tendered on the 22nd, was refused registration by reason of the date being written on an erasure. An affidavit was afterwards made stating the circumstances which led to the erasure, and the registrar expressed himself satisfied therewith, but upon the papers being examined, they were discovered to be wrong in form, the deed having been treated as an assignment, and not as a composition deed.

The CHIEF JUDGE granted a week's further time.

Solicitors, Neal & Philpot.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125 & 126, rule 260.

This was an application under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125 & 126, rule 260, for the appointment of a receiver or manager of the estate. The debtor had carried on an extensive business as a silk mercer and linen draper.

Mr. Lawrence (solicitor) for creditors in support of the application.

Mr. Plunkett (solicitor) for the debtor in support.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I have made several orders in similar cases. With the order there must be an acceptance by the gentleman you have named, Mr. White, as receiver, to bring him regularly within the jurisdiction of the Court. As a matter of practice I should state that accompanying the petition there ought to be a list of orders, and in all such cases I have requested the registrar not to receive any petition unless it is accompanied by a list of the creditors, as this is absolutely necessary, in order that notice may be given.

Rules 50 and 260.

Mr. Mote (solicitor) stated that the debtor filed a petition for arrangement on the 12th inst. He now moved under the 260th rule for an order restraining further proceedings in an action pending against the debtor.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—Have you given notice of motion to the plaintiff?

Mr. Mote replied in the negative.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—In this case the 50th rule applies. An action is pending by A. B. against C. D., and C. D. asks for an order staying the proceedings. This cannot be done in the absence of A. B., who is a party affected by the order.

Motion refused.

Jan. 19.—Re Unwin.

Mr. William Unwin formerly conducted an extensive practice as a solicitor at Leeds. On his behalf application was now made that the matter of his bankruptcy should be set down to be heard before the Chief Judge. It appeared that the case had been transferred by the order of the Lord Chancellor from the Leeds District Court to the London Court of Bankruptcy; and as it involved features of considerable importance and intricacy, the registrar desired that it should be taken by the Chief Judge.

Reed supported the application, which was unopposed on behalf of the assignees.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that as the registrar wished him to take the case he would do so.

Application granted.

Jan. 20.—Re Rosser.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 30—Bankruptcy Act, 1861, ss. 192, 197, & 198.

The debtor in this case executed, on the 19th June, 1869, a deed of composition with his creditors under section 192 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, and on the 24th of the same month the deed was tendered for registration. Afterwards the Chief Registrar issued a certificate of the registration of the deed, signed on his behalf by Mr. C. H. Keene, registrar. It appeared that proceedings were pending in the County Court of Glamorgan, in which a person named Owen was plaintiff, and the debtor one of the defendants, and the debtor had been summoned to attend the county court to be held on Monday next, to show cause why he should not pay the amount of a judgment obtained by the plaintiff, or why he should not be committed. At a former sitting of the Court the learned judge, Mr. T. H. Terrell, ruled that the certificate of the Chief Registrar must be signed by that functionary in person, and he refused to recognise the certificate of one of the other registrars, acting for the Chief Registrar.

Reed now applied in the alternative for an order on the Chief Registrar to issue a fresh certificate signed by himself, or for a rule calling upon Owen, the plaintiff, to show cause why an injunction should not be granted restraining him from taking further proceedings in the action against the debtor. The original certificate was signed in the usual way by Mr. Keene, acting for the Chief Registrar; and it was submitted that under the 30th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, any registrar might act for the Chief Registrar of the court, or for any other registrar thereof. No doubt it might be said that if the county court judge still refused to recognise the certificate of the Chief Registrar, it was open to the debtor to apply for a mandamus, but this would be an expensive course. He contended that, reading the 192nd, 197th, and 198th sections together, it was clear the whole of the parties were under the dominion of the Court, and that if proceedings at law were taken adversely to the debtor without the leave of the Court, the Court had jurisdiction to restrain those proceedings.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—As to the Chief Registrar signing a certificate which has already been signed by another registrar for him, that is quite out of the question. I cannot entertain the application for one moment. As to the residue of the application, if the county court judge has acted wrongly, the remedy is elsewhere, and the fact that the remedy is expensive does not give me a jurisdiction which I do not possess. The objection that the proceedings have been continued without the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy is an objection which may be taken before the county court judge when the defendant appears on the summons. That is a plain legal question to be submitted to him (his Lordship read the 198th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861), and I cannot assume that he will take no notice of that enactment. As the matter now stands, I do not see any necessity for interference. If the parties had come here under the 136th and 197th sections and the question had arisen between them, I might have been enabled to deal with the subject, but the case is not now in that stage, and I cannot doubt that the learned judge will act in accordance with what is plainly the law and his duty. I may say that I know of no instance in which this Court has interfered by injunction. I have no power to grant the injunction, and I see no necessity for interfering with the county court judge. He, doubtless, will pay respect to the plain directions of the Statute, and will give effect to the protection given by an officer having full and proper authority, and which, as it seems to me, is in all respects valid.

Application refused.

Rule 260.

The question again arose whether in an application under the 260th rule to restrain proceedings against a debtor who had filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement, it was necessary to give notice to the plaintiff.

Mr. Jones (solicitor) mentioned the matter ex parte, stating that if the proceedings were continued, the general body of the creditors would suffer, for the plaintiff was in a position to issue execution. This was an exceptional case, and it was submitted that the Court had a discretion in regard to requiring notice.

The CHIEF JUDGE declined to restrain further proceedings without notice to the person to be affected by the order. His Lordship said the debtor should have applied before, the action being brought on a bill of exchange. How could he interfere with the plaintiff's common law rights without hearing him?

The matter will be mentioned again on notice being given. Solicitors, Kent & Jones.

Nixon and Another v. Rigg.Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7—Debtor's Summons.

In this case a debtor's summons (the first of its kind) had been issued requiring the alleged debtor to pay a sum of £103, alleged to be due to the plaintiffs. The debtor on the 8th inst. filed an affidavit that he was not indebted to the plaintiffs in a sum sufficient to justify the presentation of a petition for adjudication; but it appeared that on the 19th he paid into the Court of Exchequer, where an action had been brought for the recovery of the plaintiffs' claim, the sum of £56. As to the residue he pleaded "never indebted."

R. Griffiths, for the debtor, asked that the summons should stand over until after the trial of the cause.

Bagley, for the plaintiff.—If that be done the debtor must find security for the balance of debt and costs. Here is a gross abuse of the Act of Parliament. The debtor first of all denies that he is indebted in an amount sufficient to support an adjudication, and then pays £56 into Court.

His LORDSHIP said the debtor must by Monday next find security for £160 to answer the balance of debt and costs. That being done the summons would stand adjourned until after the trial of the cause.

APPOINTMENTS.

The Right Hon. EDWARD SULLIVAN, the newly appointed Master of the Rolls of Ireland, took his seat on the bench on the 17th of January, in succession to the late Right Hon. J. E. Walsh. The new Master of the Rolls is the eldest son of Edward Sullivan, Esq., of Raglan-road, Dublin, formerly of Mallow. He was born in July, 1822, and was educated at Middleton School, co. Cork, and at Trinity College, Dublin; he there graduated B.A. in 1844, and obtained double-first honours in science and classics. In due course he became a scholar of Dublin University, and was auditor of the Collegio Historical Society in 1845. Mr. Sullivan was called to the Irish Bar in Michaelmas Term, 1848, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel in May, 1858. In 1860, on the promotion of Mr. Fitzgibbon to a mastership in the Irish Court of Chancery, Mr. Sullivan was appointed to succeed him as her Majesty's Third Serjeant-at-Law in Ireland. He was Law Adviser to the Crown in Ireland from 1861 to 1865, and in the former year was elected Bench of King's Inns, Dublin. In 1865 he entered Parliament as M.P. for Mallow, and in the same year was appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland on Mr. Lawson's promotion to the Attorney-Generalship. He continued in office as Solicitor-General till the retirement of the Russell ministry in 1866. On Mr. Gladstone coming into office as Premier in December, 1868, Mr. Sullivan was selected to fill the post of Attorney-General for Ireland. During the last session of Parliament he took an active share in the debates on the measure for disestablishing the Church of Ireland, and he has also rendered great service in the preparation of the future land bills for that country. The right hon. gentleman married in 1850 Bessie Josephine, daughter of the late Robert Bailey, Esq., of Cork.

Mr. GEORGE WEBBER DASENT, D.C.L., barrister-at-law, has been appointed by the Government to the post of Civil Service Commissioner. This gentleman was born about the year 1818, and was educated at King's College, London, whence he proceeded to Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1840. Mr. Dasent was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in January, 1852, and in November of the same year was admitted an advocate of the College of Doctors of Law. In 1842 he translated from the Norse "The Prose of Younger Edda"; and his translation of "Theophilus Eutychianus, from the original Greek, in Icelandic, Low German, and other languages," appeared in 1845. In 1855 he published "The Norseman in Iceland," which was followed, in 1859, by a translation of "Popular Tales from the Norse, with an Introductory Essay." He has also translated much from German and Icelandic languages. Mr. Dasent is a son-in-law of the late Mr. W. F. A. Delane, and is understood to have been for some years on the editorial staff of the Times newspaper. He has also been frequently employed as an examiner in English and the modern foreign languages in connection with the Civil Service appointments.

Mr. CHARLES ROBERT BARRY, Solicitor-General for Ireland, has been sworn in as Attorney-General, in succession to the Right Hon. Edward Sullivan, appointed Master of the Rolls. The learned gentleman is the eldest son of the late James Barry, Esq., of Dublin, and was born in 1824. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. in 1845 and M.A. in 1863. He was called to the Irish Bar in Michaelmas Term, 1845, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel in August, 1859. He was formerly First Crown Prosecutor for Dublin, but was appointed Law Adviser to the Irish Government in 1865, in which year he was returned as M.P. for Dungarvan, retaining his seat till the general election of 1868, when he was unsuccessful. Mr. Barry was nevertheless selected to fill the office of Solicitor-General for Ireland under Mr. Gladstone's Government, which he has occupied without being a member of Parliament. As Attorney-General he will have a seat at the Irish Privy Council. The right hon. gentleman married in 1855 Kate, third daughter of the late John Fitzgerald, Esq., of Dublin, and sister of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald.

Mr. EDWARD BARRY, of the Irish Bar, has been nominated Secretary to the Right Hon. Edward Sullivan, the newly-appointed Master of the Rolls of Ireland. Mr. Barry acted as counsel to Mr. Sullivan when he filled the office of Attorney-General for Ireland.

Mr. MANSFIELD PARKYNS, one of the Official Assignees of the old Court of Bankruptcy, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor to the office of Controller in Bankruptcy, in pursuance of the provisions of the Act of 1869. Mr. Parkyns was originally Official Assignee of the district court of Exeter, whence he was transferred to the court at London.

Mr. THOMAS LLEWELLYN, solicitor, of Tunstall, Staffordshire, has been appointed Clerk to the Justices of the Hurslem and Tunstall divisions, in succession to Mr. J. R. Rose, deceased. Mr. Llewellyn, who was certificated as an Attorney in Hilary Term, 1843, is a member of the local firm of Llewellyn & Hilditch.

Mr. W. MULHOLLAND has been appointed Crown Prosecutor for the county Monaghan, in room of Mr. Hamill, Q.C.

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE, M.A., of Old Palace-yard, Westminster, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the county of Middlesex, also in and for the city and liberties of Westminster, and the county of Surrey.

Mr. JOHN WAKEFIELD BURRUP, of Gloucester, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery in England.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

SIR,—In the three following questions the Judicature Commissioners seek for information on a subject which, I think I shall be able to satisfy you, is of more practical importance than at first sight it may appear to be. They ask:—

"8. In what manner, and according to what system, according to your experience, is the contentious business now separated from the non-contentious business?"

"9. What portion of the entire business, whether contentious or not, is now, according to your experience, actually disposed of by the registrars?"

"10. Can you suggest any mode by which the contentious small debt business can be effectually separated from the other contentious business, so as to save expense or time to the suitors?"

To understand these questions aright it must be borne in mind that, prior to the year 1867, the registrars of the county courts had no judicial functions to perform. Their duties were purely administrative. They issued the plaints and summonses, they acted as the bankers of the suitors, they entered up the judgments of the Court, and they kept the records. As administrative officers they were chosen for their appointments; as administrative officers they were paid for their services. In 1867, however, the Legislature thought fit to clothe these func-tionaries, for the first time, with certain judicial powers, which will be found embodied in the 16th and 17th sections of the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. Section 16, in substance, enacts that if, in any action on contract, the defendant or his agent does not appear at the hearing, or show good cause for his absence, the registrar may, by leave of the judge, upon proof of the service of the summons, and of the debt being due, enter up judgment for the plaintiff, and have the same power as the judge to order payment by instalments. Section 17 further enacts that where, at the hearing, a defendant or his authorised agent admits the claim, the registrar may, by leave of the judge, settle the terms upon which it is to be paid, and enter up judgment accordingly. Read by the light of these enactments the questions of the Commissioners are tantamount to their asking whether the law, as altered, works well; and here I am bound to express a decided opinion in the negative. Practically the plan can only be worked in one of two ways; for either the registrar must sit alone at the opening of the court, clear off the simpler cases, and then resign his post to the judge, or the judge and the registrar must sit concurrently, either in the same court or in adjoining rooms, and dispose of the list, the one taking the lighter and the other the heavier business. Both these courses are open to grave objections, some applicable to the one, some to the other, and some to each.

One obvious evil is the substitution of an inferior for a superior officer to act as judge. In making this observation I have no wish to speak disparagingly of a meritorious body of men, but I simply assert, what must be admitted by all, that the sixty judges, as a class, are, or most certainly ought to be, more efficient magistrates than their 521 registrars. If it be urged that the registrars are efficient enough to discharge the easy functions entrusted to them by the Act, and that to determine whether a debt be due or what its amount may be, whether an agent be duly authorised, or what instalments can be paid by a defendant, a little common sense is alone required, my answer is that common sense is a quality far less common than many persons suppose it to be, and that, in the proper administration of justice, nothing can safely be regarded as easy. It may seem a light matter to fix the amount of a debt, but even here much caution is necessary when the judge can only hear one side, and when, in consequence of the summons not having been personally served on the defendant, his absence can raise no presumption against him. It is astonishing how many men, without being actually dishonest, insert items in their bill of particulars which cannot bear strict investigation. Again, to apportion instalments so that they can be met by an honest defendant may appear a task which any ordinary man might perform with credit; but let him try, and he will soon, if he acts conscientiously, be not a little embarrassed in considering the state of the labour market, the price of provisions, the rental of lodgings, the number, health, and age of children, and the skill or strength of the defendant. Yet all these matters are elements in the inquiry, and collectively they soon teach the inquirer, that even with respect to this plain question, it is far easier to decide than to decide rightly. So, the ascertaining whether one person is duly authorised to appear for another is apparently a simple operation, yet I know from experience how readily mistakes are made on this subject. In my own court, to facilitate proceedings, any agent of a defendant is permitted to sign in the presence of one of the clerks a paper admitting the debt, and agreeing to any special mode of payment. The agent then comes into court and acknowledges his handwriting, swearing at the same time that he is authorised to make terms for the defendant. Now, it has happened, not once or twice, but scores of times, that the supposed agents, and especially the wives of the defendants, when narrowly examined in open court, have been obliged to repudiate an agency which they have unscrupulously avowed before the clerk. I am persuaded that this result is owing, not to any inability on the clerk's part to "scrape the conscience" of the witness, but to the different feelings experienced by the witness in the two situations. In the one, he, or more generally she, goes before the clerk in a private room; few people attend to what is going on; no awe is inspired; and the lie, whether direct or circumstantial, comes trippingly on the tongue. But a solemn and audible answer to a solemn question in open court before a "live judge," and an attentive audience is a very different matter—the truth will come out, in spite of every effort to conceal it.

This last observation leads naturally to the suggestion of another evil caused by giving judicial powers to the registrars, and that is, the want of publicity which must almost of necessity attend their labours. When the registrar sits instead of the judge, as the cases with which he can deal are of no possible interest "except to those immediately concerned," they will attract no attention, and when he sits concurrently with the judge, the public will naturally avoid the dull routine of the lower court for the livelier atmosphere of the higher. The trials before the judge will alone experience the salutary control of the press, and the proceedings before the registrar will run a serious risk of assuming the character of a hole-and-corner inquiry.

A third objection to the plan is that it has a tendency to set judges above their work, and to foster in them the dangerous error of imagining that "matters of trifling importance" may be "delegated" or "scamped" with impunity. It also encourages the idea in the public mind that the interests of the poorer classes are not regarded by the Legislature as of equal importance with those of their more fortunate neighbours; that men who have pauper doctors to attend them and their families should be satisfied with registrars to try them; that "second-chop" justice, as the Chinese would call it, is good enough for such persons, and that the boasted equality of British law is, after all, a myth, or, like everything else in this mercantile land, is, at least, resolvable into a question of pounds, shillings, and pence.

I have only space in this letter to point out one more objection to the measure; which, however, to my mind, is a very serious one. In the provinces, the registrars usually live in the towns where the courts are held. They occupy the same social position as the medical men, and some of them may possibly owe more than they can quite conveniently pay to the local tradespeople. After the Christmas bills have been sent in a reasonable time, a batch of complaints against refractory debtors is brought into the county court by the doctor, the butcher, the baker, the grocer, and the other shopkeepers in the town. These complaints come before the registrar, who has to determine whether the debts be due if the defendants do not appear, and to fix the amount of the instalments, whether the defendants appear or not. Now, under the circumstances just hinted at, is it clear that the scales of justice will be evenly balanced; and, assuming that they are so, is it clear that a censorious public will not suspect collusion or favouritism?

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

THE NEW ALBERT LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Sir,—As an answer to very numerous letters on the subject of the adopted scheme of reconstruction requiring information, will you permit me to state, through your columns, that the company is formed to carry out the terms of reconstruction of the Albert Life Assurance Company, agreed to at a meeting of policyholders and shareholders held in London on the 8th inst? It is believed that the new company gives to the policyholder in the Albert greater advantages than he can in any other way receive, and that with careful, judicious, and economical management he will ultimately receive the full amount of his policy in the Albert. To the shareholder in the Albert it is his only hope; he may gain but he cannot lose. The first proceeding of the company will be to carry out the terms of reconstruction above alluded to, and which may be summed up as follows:—

Policyholders will receive a policy in the new company, without medical re-examination, for the net value of the policy in the Albert, and for the difference between that value and the amount of the old policy he will be given a debenture in the new company, payable out of the net profits, which will not be cancelled by death, unless then fully paid off. He will also have the benefit of his claim upon the assets of the Albert, which, when adjusted and received, will be added to the policy in the new company, the debenture being correspondingly reduced, the claim upon each policy being separately adjusted and credited, and not thrown into hotchpot.

The shareholder will receive a share in this company fully paid up, equal to the amount paid in respect of the Albert; and after the policyholder has been paid or provided for out of the profits of the new company or the assets of the Albert, the shareholder will be entitled to 20 per cent. of the net profits of the company.

Policyholders, as well as shareholders, will be entitled to attend all meetings of the company, and policyholders for £500 each and shareholders for £250 each will be eligible as directors. The new company will also seek to adjust the affairs of those companies amalgamated with the Albert, and avert, if possible, the great delay, litigation, and expense attending a compulsory winding up of those companies. It will also undertake on their behalf all questions between them and the Albert or its liquidators, and in every respect this company will seek to narrow the points in the liquidation between all parties, whether of the Albert or of companies amalgamated with it, but will not involve itself in any of the Albert liabilities. CHARLES H. EDMANDS.

33, Poultry, E.C., Jan. 15.

[We decidedly approve the system of giving to policyholders a voice in the management of the company; it is one which we have ourselves advocated. Mr. Edmonds' letter, however, does not state that the policyholders in the present case are to be entitled to vote at the meetings they attend. Unless they are permitted to vote, the privilege of attending meetings will be a very barren one.—ED. S. J.]

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Jan. 20th.

On Thursday week, the Right Hon. Edward Sullivan, took his seat as Master of the Rolls, amid the acclamations of a large number of members of the bar who had assembled to receive him. After a few words, in which he alluded to the high judicial and social character of his lamented predecessor, he proceeded to deal with the business of the Court. There is a very long list of causes, consisting of the arrears of all last term's business combined with the usual business of the present term, and he will be obliged to sit for an unusually long period after term. Edward Barry, Esq., of the Munster Bar, is the secretary to the new Master of the Rolls.

The Solicitor-Generalship, vacant by the promotion of the Right Hon. Charles Barry, Esq., M.P., for Dungarvan, to the Attorney-Generalship, is still vacant. Nobody knows which of the three—Sir Colman O'Loughlin, M.P., Serjeant Dowse, M.P., or David Sherlock, Q.C., M.P., will be appointed.

All three are to be seen at the Four Courts as usual every day.

In case Sir Colman O'Loughlin be appointed, it will not be necessary for him to stand a new election, as the recent Act provides for the case of the promotion of a judge-advocate general. There is, however, this difficulty connected with his being appointed: that as Solicitor-General for Ireland, he will be Clerk to the Irish Privy Council. He is already an English Privy Councillor, and some say that his acceptance of the office would be, as such, infra dig. This, however, is so purely a matter of etiquette that it can scarcely create any practical difficulty in the mind of the Government.

There is at present a negotiation pending between a committee of the Irish Bar and the Benchers of the King's Inns, Dublin, with respect to the representation of the Irish Bar, that body which at present chiefly consists of judges. Nothing definite has, however, yet transpired.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Hilary Term, 1870.

The final examination of candidates took place on the 18th and 19th inst., at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, London.

The examiners were the Master Templer, of the Court of Exchequer, Mr. F. H. Janson, Mr. Park Nelson, Mr. H. T. Young, and Mr. C. R. Williams.

Before the examination commenced the Master addressed the gentlemen present as follows:—

"Candidates for admission,—Before you commence the answers to the questions look well at the question, and give as direct and concise an answer as you can. You may then enlarge and illustrate your meaning. But a directly correct answer is all that is required by the examiner to ensure you the full number of marks. The object has been to see if you are grounded in the principles of your profession; for your easy and safe practice will depend almost entirely on the success with which you have mastered the principles—the maxim "melior est petere fontes quam sectari rivulos." It is the motto to Smith's "Leading Cases," and is perhaps the most valuable to the student of all the maxims of the law—at least if it teaches him to direct his reading in that spirit. I will not detain you longer from the paper, but I trust your success here will be but a prelude to a successful professional career to each and all of you."

QUESTIONS.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. State the ordinary proceedings in a common law action in a superior court that is tried before a jury.
2. What are the principal common law actions?
3. What is the difference between "mesne" and "final" process?
4. What are the several writs of execution? and state their effect.
5. Explain the nature of a demurrer.
6. What is the meaning of the word venue in a common law action?
7. Explain the distinction between local and transitory actions, and the meaning of the maxim "debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci?"
8. What is the meaning of the word "consideration" as applied to a contract? and explain the maxim "ex nudo pacto non oritur actio."
9. Explain the distinction between a contract under seal, and a contract not under seal, and particularly as to the proper parties to sue and be sued respectively.
10. What is the distinction between "slander" and "libel"?
11. What are the degrees of evidence, and when does secondary evidence become admissible?
12. State the usual form of a bill of exchange, and explain the relative legal liabilities of the parties thereto.
13. What is a guarantee—and how is it affected by the statute law?
14. State the provisions of the statute of frauds relative to a sale of goods.
15. Explain the distinction of "costs as between attorney and client," and "costs as between party and party."

II.—CONVEYANCING.

1. Give the ordinary provisions (1) of a lease of a town house, (2) of a conveyance of freeholds, (3) of a mortgage of freeholds. The effect of the provisions may be shortly stated.
2. Give the short heads of the settlement you would advise on the part of a gentleman in trade prepared to settle £10,000 consols on his marriage with a lady possessed of an equal sum, and also the heads of the settlement on her part.
3. How would you require a gentleman, on his marriage effectually to secure payment at a future time, to the trustees of a sum of money so as to give such sum priority in case of his death, over his general creditors? and state what change of the law has recently occurred to affect your answer.
4. To what extent can real estate be entailed, or, where there is no life interest can money be accumulated?
5. How would you proceed to affect the sale of a settled estate where no power of sale is given in the settlement, and how may the proceeds of such sale, when completed, be applied?

6. In what cases can relief be obtained in favour of a defective exercise of a power, and how?

7. A man possessed of real and personal estate, dies intestate, leaving wife and father and brothers and sisters, by the whole and half-blood, surviving him. Amongst whom would his property be divided?

8. A, being owner in fee of land, devises it to his son B, absolutely, B dies before A, leaving issue one son and two daughters, and having made a will directing all his estate whatsoever to be converted into money, and divided equally between his three children. Upon A's death how will A's land be dealt with?

9. If a person who has contracted to purchase real estate die intestate before completion of the purchase, in whom will the right to the conveyance vest, and by whom must the purchase money be paid? State what change of the law has occurred of late years in this respect.

10. What are the relative rights of lords and tenants of manors in respect to the enfranchisement of copyholds, and are these rights mutual in the case of all manors? and state the exemptions, if any.

11. What is an improved leasehold ground rent, and how is it usually created?

12. What legal restrictions exist against the gift or transfer, by will or inter vivos, of land for charitable objects?

13. If you were solicitor for a charity desirous of acquiring land, in what manner and with what formalities would you prepare and complete a purchase deed, or in case of a lease what provisions should be inserted in it to make it legal?

14. Does the cancellation of an instrument operate to defeat the estate created by it, or not? and give the reasons for your opinion.

15. How would a tenant in tail in remainder of freehold and copyhold land proceed if he desired effectually to bar the entail?

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. If a trustee conveys the estate held in trust to a bond fide purchaser for value who has no notice of the trust, can the cestui que trust recover the estate from the purchaser, or claim any lien on it? State the reason for your answer.

2. State the distinction prevailing in a court of equity in dealing with cases of mistake in matters of law, and mistake in matters of fact.

3. A testator having £1,000 Consols, £5,000 Indian 5 per cents. and no reduced annuities, gives the following legacies by his will: "I bequeath unto B. my £1,000 £3 per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities. And I bequeath to C. a legacy of £1,000 Reduced Bank Annuities." The testator dies on the 1st of January, 1870. To what legacies do B. and C. become entitled, and at what period payable or transferable, and what interest or dividends can they claim?

4. If a person is appointed a trustee by a deed of settlement and accepts the trust, can he at any time resign, and how can he be properly relieved from the trust, and can the cestui que trust in any way compel him to continue the trust?

5. If the trust deed does not contain any receipt clause, to what extent have the trustees authority to give a valid receipt for purchase money without the concurrence of the cestui que trust?

6. What would be the effect, as regards costs, of a set of trustees appearing separately in a suit by different solicitors?

7. What is the rule with regard to the period within which a cestui que trust can claim a trust fund, or arrears of dividends from his trustee?

8. B. contracts to sell an estate to C. in consideration of C. granting B. an annuity during the latter's life. Before the contract is carried out, or any instalment of the annuity becomes due under the terms of the contract B. dies. What effect has his death on the contract?

9. Can an executor in any way protect himself from creditors in distributing his testator's estate without an administration suit in Chancery, or bar creditors' claims to any extent?

10. If the Master of the Rolls orders a defendant to pay a sum of money, is the pendency of an appeal to the Chancellor alone sufficient to prevent the plaintiff from enforcing payment?

11. May a special injunction be obtained in any, and what cases without notice?

12. Is the answer of a defendant evidence for himself, or can it in any way be made so?

13. How can an infant institute a suit in equity, and can a suit be instituted on his behalf without his consent?

14. Can a guardian be appointed to an infant without suit, and if so, how?

15. Define a stop order in Chancery, and state how it is to be obtained, and made effective?

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

1. State the general object and policy of the bankrupt laws?

2. Under the recent statute, what general distinction is made between traders, and non-traders?

3. Specify the several Acts enabling a creditor to apply to make a debtor a bankrupt, and within what period must such acts have taken place?

4. What are the duties of a trustee, and how is he appointed?

5. What are the functions of the committee of inspection?

6. What debts of a bankrupt are to be paid in priority?

7. What description of property is not divisible among creditors?

8. In whom does the bankrupt's property vest upon adjudication?

9. What are the conditions under which an order of discharge will be granted?

10. From what debts or liabilities will an order of discharge not release a bankrupt?

11. How is property affected which is deemed to be in the order and disposition of a bankrupt?

12. What is the mode, prescribed by the late Act, for dealing with contracts and property considered worthless?

13. What claims cannot be proved in bankruptcy?

14. Define the meaning of "a fraudulent preference."

15. Under what circumstances does a settlement of property by one who is declared bankrupt become void?

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

1. State the difference between a public crime and a civil injury.

2. Name the principal courts of criminal jurisdiction.

3. Of what description are the commissions by virtue of which the judges of assize try indictable offences?

4. To what counties does the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court extend?

5. When is the Court of Quarter Session held elsewhere than in London?

6. Of how many must a grand jury consist?

7. How many of the grand jury must agree in finding a bill?

8. Under what circumstances are the confessions of a prisoner admissible against him, and under what circumstances are such confessions inadmissible?

9. If collateral information be obtained by means of an inadmissible confession, can such information be used? if it can be, give an example of the mode in which it may be used.

10. What is the offence of obtaining money under false pretences? distinguish it from larceny.

11. By what statute or statutes is it made criminal to send letters containing threats of murder, or to burn houses, stacks of corn, or other agricultural produce; and what punishment is annexed to the offence?

12. Upon what principle was the stealing of deeds not larceny at common law; and how is the offence now dealt with by statute?

13. In what cases can one person only be indicted for conspiracy, and what averment must the indictment contain?

14. Are there any crimes in which there cannot be accessories before or after the fact? if any, give examples.

15. If a witness against a prisoner charged with an indictable offence die after his deposition has been taken, and before the trial of the accused, what proof must be given before the deposition can be read in evidence at the trial?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS AT THE FINAL EXAMINATION FOR HILARY TERM, 1870.

I.—COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By E. A. C. SCHALCH, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. The plaintiff first issues a writ, which is the beginning of the action. The defendant appears. The plaintiff declares. The defendant pleads. The plaintiff replies, generally joining issue. The issue being then ascertained, notice of trial is given to the defendant by the plaintiff. The cause goes to trial before a judge of assize and a jury. If the plaintiff obtain the verdict he can sign judgment and issue execution, unless the amount due from the defendant to him is paid. If there is a demurrer, the point of law thereby raised, has to be decided by the Court in banco. So also have any points that are reserved by the judge at the trial.

2. Common law actions are divided into actions of tort—viz., trespass, case, trover, and replevin; actions of contract—viz., assumpsit, debt, detinue, covenant, and account; and the action of ejectment.

3. Mesne process is process during the continuance of an action, before judgment—as the arrest of a defendant about to leave the country. This process is now subject to the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 6. Final process is process after judgment—as execution against goods by the writ of fi. fa. to obtain payment of the amount of a judgment.

4. The writs of execution are: fi. facias, for the seizure of the goods of a judgment-debtor; capias ad satisfaciendum, for the arrest of the judgment-debtor. This kind of execution is now subject to 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62. Habere facias possessionem, for giving possession of land to a successful plaintiff in ejectment; elegit, to obtain satisfaction of a judgment out of the land of the judgment-debtor as well as out of his goods. There is also the writ of levari facias, that is now seldom used.

5. A demurrer is a form of pleading by which the party demurring admits the facts alleged in the pleading to which he demurs, but denies the conclusions of law set up in that pleading.

6. The venue is the place where the action is intended to be tried, and is now always stated on the margin of the declaration. Originally the venue was generally the place where, in fact, the cause of action arose.

7. Local actions are actions that must be tried where the cause of action arose, such as actions relating to land, and some others. In these actions the venue must consequently be always laid where the cause of action arose. Transitory actions are those which may be tried anywhere instead of only where the cause of action arose. The meaning of "debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci" is that actions of debt and contract are transitory actions, and so belong to no place, but may be tried anywhere. It has also the extended meaning that debts due or contracts made abroad may be sued upon in England.

8. A consideration is the cause required by law in the case of a simple contract to give validity to the promise. No simple contract is binding unless the promise is given for a consideration. A consideration has been defined to be "any benefit accruing to him who makes the promise; or any loss, trouble or disadvantage incurred by or any charge imposed upon him to whom the promise is made." Special contracts require no consideration, but simple contracts always require consideration. Without it they are of no binding effect, and this is the meaning of "ex nudo pacto non oritur actio." A mere "pact" that is promise without consideration, cannot be the foundation of an action.

9. The distinction as to consideration between special and simple contracts is answered in the preceding question. In form a special contract is a written contract sealed and delivered. It may create a merger and an estoppel; it needs no consideration, and binds land in the hands of an heir. A simple contract is any contract, whether verbal or written, not under seal. It does not create a merger, estoppel, nor does it bind land in the hands of the heir and it needs a consideration. The person to be sued upon a simple contract is he who has made and broken the promise. The person to sue is the person from whom the consideration moved and to whom the promise was made. The person to be sued on a special contract is the person who has made and broken the promise. The person to sue is the person who has the legal interest, and who is a party to the instrument. A third person, a stranger to the deed, cannot sue thereon, although the covenant be made expressly for his advantage. This is, however, subject to the statute allowing covenants to run with the land, and also to 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 5.

10. Libel is defamation by writing, printing or signs. Slander is defamation by words only. A libel is actionable whether or not it has, in fact, caused damage. It is also indictable. Slander gives no right of action unless damage is proved, except in three cases—viz., slander of a man—(1) in his profession, trade or occupation; (2) By accusing him of a criminal offence; (3) By charging him with having an infectious disease. Slander is not indictable.

11. Evidence is divided into primary and secondary evidence. Primary evidence is that kind of proof which in the eye of the law affords the greatest certainty of the fact in question. Until it is shown that the production of this evidence is out of a party's power, no other proof of the fact is in general admitted. All evidence falling short of this in its degree is secondary evidence, and as a general rule, becomes admissible when the primary evidence cannot be produced. There are, however, many cases in which secondary evidence may under certain conditions be admitted, although it is not actually out the party's power to produce the primary evidence.

12. The following is an ordinary form of a bill of exchange:—

London, 1st January, 1860.

One month after date (or at sight or on demand or one month after sight) pay A. B. or order (or bearer) one hundred pounds.

X. Y.

To Mr. C. D. street, London.

X. Y. is the drawer, C. D. the drawee, and A. B. the payee. If the drawer accepts the bill he does so by writing the word "accepted" and his signature across the face of the bill. The drawer and any indorsers there may be guarantors that the bill will be accepted when duly presented for acceptance, and paid when duly presented for payment. If the bill is dishonoured either by non-acceptance or non-payment, they become each of them liable to pay the amount of the bill to the holder on receiving due notice of dishonour. If the bill is accepted the acceptor is person primarily liable upon it. No one else can be liable upon the bill until he has broken his contract to pay it.

13. A guarantee is a promise to answer for the payment of some debt, or the performance of some duty in the event of the failure of another person who is, in the first instance, liable for such payment or performance. Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds requires that guarantees must be in writing. The meaning of this has been decided to be that the consideration as well as the promise of the guarantee must be written. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, has now provided that the consideration for a guarantee need not appear in the writing required by the Statute of Frauds.

14. Section 17 of the Statute of Frauds enacts that "no contract for the sale of any goods or wares or merchandises, for the price of £10 or upwards, shall be allowed to be good except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorised."

15. In taxing costs as between party and party there are usually costs which the successful plaintiff cannot recover, and which he has consequently himself to pay. These costs may be allowed him on a taxation as between attorney and client, in which mode of taxation the principle is that the successful party shall be entirely free from what are usually called extra costs. The difference between the two kinds of taxation is that in the latter the costs are taxed on a more liberal scale as towards the successful party than in the former mode.

II.—CONVEYANCING.

(By H. N. MOZLEY, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. A lease of a town house would contain (besides the prefatory matter and the demise, &c.) the following provisions:—

a Covenants by the lessee:

1. To pay the rent.
2. To pay the rates and taxes.

3. To keep the premises insured.
4. To keep the premises in repair.
5. To yield up at the end of the term.
6. That the landlord may enter and inspect.
7. That the house shall be used as a dwelling-house only;

8. And shall not be assigned or underlet.

b Provide for re-entry by the lessor on breach of covenants.

c Covenant by the lessor for quiet enjoyment (Davidson, Conv. Prec. 7th ed. 235).

A conveyance of freeholds would contain covenants by vendor for right to convey free from incumbrances, notwithstanding anything by him done or knowingly suffered; and for further assurance (ibid. 61).

If the purchaser was married before 1834, or if the circumstances are such that it might be thought possible that he was married before 1834, the conveyance would be made to uses to bar dower, in order to avoid future questions on the title. But this practice is obviously becoming less necessary every day.

A mortgage of freeholds would contain:— a A covenant by the mortgagor for the repayment of the mortgage money, with interest, at the end of six months.

b A proviso for redemption.

c A covenant by the mortgagor for the payment of interest so long as the principal shall remain unpaid.

d A power of sale by the mortgagor.

e On sale by person not having the legal estate (c.g., by personal representatives), persons having the legal estate to join.

f Power of sale not to be exercised by mortgagor until he has given notice to the mortgagor to pay off the money due, and default shall have been made in payment for six months after giving or having such notice; or until the whole or part of some half-yearly payment of interest shall have become in arrear for three months.

g Purchasers not to be bound to see that the events mentioned in last clause have happened.

h Mortgagee's receipt to be a discharge to the purchasers.

i Trusts of the purchase-money—(1) To pay the expenses incurred in the sale; (2) to pay the money due on the mortgage debt; (3) residue in trust for the mortgagor.

k Power to be exercised by any person entitled to receive the mortgage-money.

l Mortgagee's indemnity clause.

m Covenant by mortgagor for right to convey, free from incumbrances.

n And for further assurance (ibid. 128).

2. The settlement of the husband's £10,000 should contain—a A power to vary investments with consent of the husband and wife during their joint lives, and the consent of the survivor during his or her life, and after the death of the survivor at the discretion of the trustees.

b Trusts of income for husband for life, and after his death.

c For the wife for her life, and after the death of survivor.

d For the children, as husband and wife, or survivor, shall appoint, and in default of appointment.

e In trust for children equally, who, being a son or sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or, being a daughter or daughters, should attain that age or marry; with hotchpot clause.

f Provisoes for advancement, maintenance, and education of children, and accumulation clause.

g In default of children, in trust for the husband, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

The settlement, as regards the lady's money, would contain—a A power to vary investments, as above.

b Trusts of income for wife for her separate use, and after her death.

c For husband for life, and after the death of survivor.

d } In trust for children as above.

g In default of children, in trust as wife shall appoint, and in default.

h If the wife survive the husband, then in trust for the wife.

i If the husband survive the wife, then in trust for such person or persons as would, under the Statute of Distributions, have been entitled thereto had the wife died possessed thereof intestate, and without having ever been married.

3. The solicitor should require the intending husband to execute a bond to the trustees for payment of the sum of money in question. This would give the trustees, as being specialty creditors, priority over the simple contract creditors on the death of the husband, until the Act of the last session (32 & 33 Vict. c. 46), for extinguishing the priority of specialty creditors over simple contract creditors, came into operation, since which a mortgage would be necessary to effectually secure priority over other creditors.

4. Real estate cannot be given to an unborn person for life, followed by any estate given to the child of such unborn person. This maxim, it is evident, forbids the tying up of lands for a longer period than can elapse until the unborn child of some living person shall come of age; that is, for the life of a party now in being, and for twenty-one years after; with a further period of a few months during gestation, supposing the child should be of posthumous birth (Williams on Real Property, 8th ed. pp. 264, 306).

Where there is no life interest, money can be accumulated for twenty-one years after the death of the grantor or settlor, but no longer (Wms. on Real Prop. 8th ed. p. 307; the Thellusson Act, 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98).

5. By application to the Court of Chancery for an order for sale under the Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 120), the money to be raised on any such sale is to be paid either to trustees of whom the Court shall approve, or into court, and is to be applied to the following purposes, namely, the redemption of the land tax, or of any incumbrance affecting the hereditaments sold, or any other hereditaments vested in the same way, or the purchase of other hereditaments to be settled in the same manner, or in the payment to any person becoming absolutely entitled (section 23). And the money is in the meantime to be invested in Exchequer Bills or Consols, and the interest or dividends paid to the tenant for life (section 25). See Wms. on Real Prop. 8th ed. pp. 26, 32.

6. Equity will aid the defective execution of a power in the following cases:—If an intended appointee be a purchaser from the person intending to exercise the power, or a creditor of such person, or his wife, or his child, or if the appointment be for a charitable purpose. In such cases the Court of Chancery will compel the person in possession of the estate, and who was to hold it until the power was duly exercised, to give it up on an undue execution of such power (Williams on Real Property, 8th ed. pp. 287-8, and authorities there cited).

7. The father of the deceased would succeed to his real estate, subject to the widow's right (if any) to dower.

With regard to the personal estate of the deceased, as he has no children, the widow will be entitled to half, and the father to the other half.

8. The land will devolve as if B. had died immediately after A.

That is to say, the land will, on A.'s death, be sold, and divided equally among B.'s three children (Wms. on Real Prop. 8th ed. p. 203; 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 33).

9. In cases not falling under the operation of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69, s. 2, which was passed in the year 1867, the right to the conveyance would vest in the heir or other real representative of the intending purchaser, but the purchase-money would be payable by the executor or administrator out of the residuary personalty, on the principle that equity considers that as done which ought to be done; and if the contract were fulfilled the real estate of the deceased would gain at the expense of his personal estate.

The second section of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 69, is in these words: "In the construction of the said Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113) and of this Act the word 'mortgage' shall extend to any lien for unpaid purchase-money upon any lands or hereditaments purchased by a testator." The Act referred to statute (17 & 18 Vict. c. 113) provides that where a mortgagor of land dies, the mortgage debt shall, in the absence of any declaration by the deceased to the contrary, be borne primarily by the mortgaged estate, and not by the general personal estate of the mortgagor. So that in cases falling under the Act of 1867 the estate contracted to be sold would (in the absence of declaration by the "testator" to the contrary) be borne primarily by the estate contracted to be purchased.

10. By the Copyhold Acts of 1851 and 1858 the lord or tenant, after the next admittance on or after the 1st of July, 1853, may compel enfranchisement of the lands to which there shall have been such admittance as aforesaid. No tenant to require enfranchisement until after payment of the fines due, and fees consequent on admittance.

If the enfranchisement be made at the instance of the tenant, the compensation is to be a gross sum of money, to be paid at the time of the completion of the enfranchisement, or to be charged on the land by way of mortgage; and where the enfranchisement is effected at the instance of the lord, the compensation is to be an annual rent-charge to be issuing out of the lands enfranchised, subject to the right of the parties, with the sanction of the Copyhold Commissioners, to agree that the compensation shall be either a gross sum or a yearly rent-charge, or a conveyance of land, to be settled to the same uses as the manor is settled. The charge in respect of enfranchisement is to be the first charge on the land.

The curtesy, dower, or freebench of persons married before the enfranchisement is completed, is expressly saved; and all the commonable rights of the tenant continue attached to his lands, notwithstanding the same shall have become freehold. And no enfranchisement under these Acts is to affect the estate or rights of any lord or tenant in any mines or minerals within or under the lands enfranchised, or any other lands, unless with the express consent in writing of such lord or tenant. (See Williams on Real Property, 8th ed. pp. 367, 358).

11. Where a lessee of land underlets at an increased rent the increased rent is called the improved ground rent. It is generally created in the case of a building lease, where the lessee, having erected a house upon the land, underlets at an increased rent.

12. The Mortmain Act (9 Geo. 2, c. 26) provides that no lands or hereditaments, nor any money, stocks, or other personal estate, to be laid out in the purchase of lands or hereditaments, shall be conveyed or settled for any charitable uses, unless by deed indented, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, twelve calendar months at least before the death of the donor or grantor, and enrolled in the High Court of Chancery within six calendar months next after the execution thereof; and unless the same be made to take effect in possession for the charitable use intended immediately from the making thereof, and be without any power of revocation, reservation, trust, condition, limitation, clause, or agreement whatsoever, for the benefit of the donor or grantor, or of any person or persons claiming under him (section 1).

Gifts to either of the two Universities, or any of their colleges, or to the colleges of Eton, Winchester, or Westminster, for the support and maintenance of the scholars only upon those foundations, are excepted by section 4.

For the amendments introduced in the law of mortmain by recent legislation, see Williams on Real Property, 8th ed. p. 66 et. seq.)

13. The conveyance must be made by deed indented, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, and enrolled in chancery within six calendar months after the execution thereof.

14. An estate or interest in real or personal property which has once vested by a deed cannot be divested by cancelling the deed; because, once vested, it exists, independently of the deed, in the person in whose favour it was created or to whom it was transferred (Smith on Real and Personal Property, 3rd ed. p. 873, and authorities there cited).

15. The tenant in tail in remainder of freeholds must procure the assent of the protector, and must enrol the disentailing deed in the Court of Chancery within six months of its execution. The consent of the protector may be given by the same deed by which the entail is barred, or by a separate deed. It must be enrolled in chancery at or previously to the enrolment of the deed which bars the entail.

An estate tail in copyholds is barred by surrender, and when an estate tail in copyhold is in remainder, the necessary consent of the protector may be given either by deed to be entered on the rolls of the manor, or by the concurrence of the protector in the surrender, in which case the memorandum or entry of the surrender must expressly state that such consent has been given (Wms. Real Prop., 8th ed. pp. 51, 350).

III.—EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By H. N. MOZLEY, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. The cestui que trust will not be able to recover the estate from the bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice; for the equities of both parties are equal, and the purchaser has acquired the legal estate by conveyance from the trustee. But where the equities are equal, the law will prevail. Therefore equity will not interfere, or take the estate out of the hands of the purchaser.

2. The general rule with regard to mistakes of law is, that ignorance of law will not furnish an excuse for any person, either for a breach or for an omission of duty: Ignorantia legis non excusat; and this maxim is as much respected in equity as at law (Story Eq. Jur. 9th ed. pp. 101, 102).

It has, however, been laid down as unquestionable doctrine that if a party, acting in ignorance of a plain and settled principle of law, is induced to give up a portion of his property to another, under the name of a compromise, a court of equity will relieve him from the effect of his mistake (Naylor v. Winch, 1 Sim. & Stu. 555). But where a doubtful question arises, such as a question respecting the true construction of a will, a different rule prevails; and a compromise fairly entered into, with due deliberation, will be upheld in a court of equity (Lord Langdale in Pickering v. Pickering, 2 Beav. 56).

In regard to mistakes in matters of fact, relief will be granted where the mistake is unilateral, and the fact was material to the act or contract, and was not doubtful from its own nature, and was a fact which would not be ascertained by such diligence or care as is usual in transactions of a like nature, and of which the other party was under a legal obligation to inform the mistaken person (See St. Eq. Jur. secs. 121—151; Smith, Man. Eq. 7th ed. p. 44).

Or we may state briefly, that a court of equity will not in general interfere to relieve against a mistake in a matter of law, but will interfere to relieve against an innocent mistake in a matter of fact.

3. The legacy of £1,000 Consols being specific, B. will be entitled to it, with interest and dividends accrued due from the testator's death. As regards the legacy to C., C. will be entitled to so much of the £5,000 Indian five per Cents. as will purchase £1,000 Reduced Annuities, payable on the 1st of January, 1871, with interest from that time. For the legacy to C. is pecuniary, and not specific, and is therefore payable one year after the testator's death (Roper on Legacies, 4th ed. pp. 204, 864).

4. A person who has accepted the trust cannot afterwards renounce it. The only mode by which he can obtain a release is either under the sanction of a court of equity, or by virtue of a special power in the instrument creating the trust, or with the consent of all the parties interested, being sui juris (Lewin on Trusts, 5th ed., p. 294, and cases there cited).

5. The receipts in writing of any trustees or trustee for any money payable to them or him, by reason or in the exercise of any trusts or powers reposed or vested in them or him, are sufficient discharges for the money therein expressed to be received, and effectually exonerate the persons paying such money from seeing to the application thereof, or from being answerable for any loss or misapplication thereof (Statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, s. 29).

6. The effect, as regards costs, of a set of trustees appearing separately in a suit by different solicitors would be that some or all of them would lose their right to their full costs. For, as one solicitor or set of solicitors would be sufficient to represent all the trustees, one set of costs only would be allowed to all the trustees. The apportionment of the costs is left to the taxing master (See Lewin on Trusts, 5th ed. p. 718, and cases there cited).

7. As long as the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, under an express trust, is acknowledged to exist, lapse of time can constitute no bar to an account or other proper relief for the cestui que trust. But when the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is no longer admitted to exist, or time and long acquiescence have obscured the nature and character of the trust, a court of equity will refuse relief upon the ground of lapse of time and inability to do justice (Sm. Man. Eq. 7th ed. p. 139).

8. Equity considers that as done which ought to be done. Now, if the sale were made and the annuity granted according to the contract, B. would not be entitled to receive any instalment of the annuity, and yet C. would be entitled to the estate. Therefore on general principles this will be also the case, though the contract should not have been carried out in B.'s lifetime. See Jackson v. Lever, 3 Bro. C. C. 605; Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 246; Kenny v. Werham, 6 Madd. 355. And the circumstance of the contingency having turned out unfavourably to the vendor, is no ground of defence. But if, it is laid down by Lord Cottenham in Davies v. Cooper (5 Myl. & Cr. 279), that "it is true that, in sales of property in consideration of an annuity, the Court has decreed specific performance, notwithstanding the death of the annuitant; but in such a case the Court will inquire, with some jealousy, into the fairness of the transaction."

The above answer assumes that the terms of the contract have been actually fixed upon before B.'s death, otherwise the contract is void (Strickland v. Turner, 7 Exch. 208).

9. Where an executor or administrator shall have given such or the like notices as, in the opinion of the Court in which such executor or administrator is sought to be charged, would have been given by the Court of Chancery in an administration suit, for creditor and others to send in their claims against the estate of the testator or intestate, such executor or administrator shall, at the expiration of the time named in the said notices or the last of the said notices for sending in such claims, be at liberty to distribute the assets of the testator or intestate, or any part thereof, amongst the parties entitled thereto, having regard to the claims of which such executor or administrator has then notice (Statute 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 29).

The last-cited provision operates only to bar the right of the non-claiming creditor as against the executor or administrator; for the section goes on to provide that "nothing in the present Act contained shall prejudice the right of any creditor or claimant to follow the assets or any part thereof into the hands of the person or persons who may have received the same respectively."

10. An order for a rehearing or an appeal does not stop or hinder any proceedings on the decree or order appealed from, unless by special order of the Court. The Court will, however, in some cases, upon special application of the appellant, suspend the proceedings under a decree or order pending a rehearing on appeal (Daniell, Chan. Prac. 4th ed. 1351).

11. Where the nature of the act to be restrained is such that an immediate stoppage of it is absolutely necessary to protect property from destruction, or where the mere act of giving notice to the defendant of the intention to make the application might be, of itself, productive of the mischief apprehended, by inducing him to accelerate the act, the Court will award the injunction without notice, or even before service of the copy of the bill. The facts, however, which form the grounds of the application must be fully stated to the Court, and no material fact must be suppressed.

If the Court thinks that the case is not so urgent as to require its immediate interference, or that the affidavits in support of it are not positive enough, it will order notice of the application to be given to the defendant (Dan. Chan. Prac. 4th ed. 1506—7).

12. In a hearing on bill and answer each defendant may read the whole of his answer, for it is not contradicted by the plaintiff.

On a motion for a decree the state of the pleadings is the same as on a hearing on bill and answer, and the passages which may be read are therefore the same.

But on replication filed, the defendant is in general precluded from reading his answer as evidence. If, however, the answer relate wholly to the defendant's own acts and defaults, he is in a position to swear absolutely to the truth of the answer; and in this case he may, even after replication, obtain an order allowing him to read the answer as an affidavit (Hunter's Suit in Equity, 4th ed. pp. 68—70).

13. An infant cannot institute a suit alone, but must do so under the protection of an adult, called the "next friend," who will be answerable for the conduct and for the costs of the suit. A suit may be instituted on behalf of an infant without his consent. But the Court will, on the application of the defendant, or of any person acting as next friend of the infant for the purpose of the application, where a strong case is shown that a suit preferred in the name of an "infant" is not for the infant's benefit, or is instituted from improper motives, direct an inquiry concerning the propriety of the suit (Dan. Chan. Prac. ch. iii, s. 6; Hunter's Suit in Equity, 4th ed. p. 167).

14. A guardian to an infant may be appointed without suit, by a summons, entitled in the matter of the infant, being taken out at chambers (15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 26; Cons. Ord. 35, rule 1; Hunter's Suit in Equity, 4th ed. p. 210).

15. A stop order in chancery is an order obtained by an assignee of a fund in court, so as to give notice of the assignment, and prevent dealings with the fund. This order is obtainable in chambers whenever the assignor and assignee concur; or otherwise a special petition, with evidence of the assignor's title and of the assignment to the petitioner, must be presented to the Court. The order is drawn up in the usual way, and left at the office of the Accountant-General; after which no dealing can be had with the fund affected until the stop order is finally discharged, or until an order is expressly made to deal with the fund notwithstanding the previous stop order (Hunter's Suit in Equity, 4th ed. p. 217).

IV.—BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

(By CHALONER W. CHUTE, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. The bankrupt law, as distinguished from the ordinary law between debtor and creditor, involved the three general principles of a summary and immediate seizure of all the debtor's property, a distribution of it among the creditors in general (instead of merely applying a portion of it to the payment of the individual complainant), and the discharge of the debtor from future liability for the debts then existing.

2. Persons who are not traders cannot be made bankrupts under the Act in respect of any debt older than the 6th of August, 1861 (the date of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861), but there is no such limitation in the case of traders, who may be made bankrupt in respect of any debt not barred by the Statutes of Limitation (s. 118).

Also a trader can, and a non-trader cannot, be made bankrupt for departing from his dwelling-house (section 6).

And the doctrine of reputed ownership is confined to traders (section 15).

And in the case of traders only is the onus of defending a voluntary settlement thrown upon the settlor (section 91).

3. The acts of bankruptcy upon which an adjudication may be founded, are—a A conveyance or assignment of property to a trustee for the benefit of creditors generally:

b A fraudulent conveyance in England, or elsewhere, of the debtor's property, or of any part thereof:

c The doing with intent to defeat or delay creditors, of any of the following things: namely, departing or remaining out of England; or (in case of a trader) departing from his dwelling-house, or otherwise absenting himself; or beginning to keep house; or suffering himself to be outlawed:

d Filing in the Court, a declaration admitting inability to pay debts:

e If (in the case of a trader) execution has issued against the debtor on any legal process for the purpose of obtaining payment of not less than £50, and has been levied by seizure and sale of his goods:

f If the creditor presenting the petition has served on the debtor a debtor's summons requiring the debtor to pay a sum due, of an amount of not less than £50, and the debtor being a trader has for the space of seven days, or not being a trader has for the space of three weeks succeeding the service of such summons neglected to pay such sum or to secure or compound for the same.

But no person is to be adjudged a bankrupt on any of the above grounds unless the act of bankruptcy on which the adjudication is grounded, has occurred within six months before the presentation of the petition for adjudication (Section 6).

4. The trustee is to have regard to any directions given by a resolution of the creditors at any general meeting, or by the committee of inspection; and is to call a meeting of the committee of inspection at least once every three months for auditing his accounts and for determining whether any or what dividend is to be paid. He may also call special meetings of the committee as he thinks necessary. Subject to these provisions he is to exercise his own discretion in managing the estate and distributing it amongst the creditors.

He is for the purpose of acquiring or retaining possession of the property of the bankrupt, to be in the same position as if he were receiver of such property appointed by the Court of Chancery (Section 20).

The trustee is appointed by a general meeting of the creditors of the bankrupt; or by the committee of inspection, as the creditors may resolve. When he appointed the creditors shall declare what security is to be given, and to whom, by the person so appointed before he enters on his office (Section 14).

5. The functions of the Committee of Inspection are the superintendence of administration by the trustee of the bankrupt's property (section 14), and (on the calling of a meeting by the trustee) to audit his accounts, and determine whether any, and what, dividend is to be paid (Section 20).

6. The debts which are to be paid in priority to all other debts (though between themselves they rank equally and abate in equal proportions) are—a All parochial or other local rates due at the date of the order of adjudication, and having become due and payable within twelve months next before such time; all assessed taxes, land tax, and property or income tax assessed on him up to the 5th day of April next before the date of the order of adjudication, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment:

b All wages or salary of any clerk or servant in the employment of the bankrupt at the date of the order of adjudication not exceeding four months' wages or salary, and not exceeding £50; all wages of any labourer or workman in the employment of the bankrupt at the date of the order of adjudication, and not exceeding two months' wages (Section 32).

If the bankrupt had any apprentice or articled clerk, and any money has been paid by him as a fee, the trustee may pay him preferentially a reasonable sum (section 33).

7. The property of the bankrupt, divisible amongst his creditors, comprises all the property vested in him at the commencement of the bankruptcy or devolving on him during its continuance except—a Property held by the bankrupt on trust for any other person:

b The tools (if any) of his trade, and the necessary apparel and bedding of himself, his wife and children, to a value, inclusive of tools and apparel and bedding, not exceeding £20 in the whole" (Section 15).

8. Immediately upon the order for adjudication being made the property of the bankrupt is to vest in the registrar, but on the appointment of a trustee the property is forthwith to pass to and vest in the trustee appointed.

While the registrar holds the office of trustee he is to apply to the Court for directions as to the mode of administering such property, and is not to take possession thereof unless directed by the Court (Section 17).

9. The order of discharge is not to be granted unless it is proved to the Court that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled, that is to say, either that a dividend of not less than ten shillings in the pound has been paid out of the property, or might have been paid, except through the negligence or fraud of the trustee, or that a special resolution of the creditors has been passed to the effect that the bankruptcy or the failure to pay ten shillings in the pound has in their opinion arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible, and that they desire that an order of discharge should be granted to him (section 48).

10. The order of discharge will not release the bankrupt from any debt or liability incurred by means of any fraud or breach of trust, nor from any debt or liability whereof he has obtained forbearance by any fraud, but it will release him from all other debts provable under the bankruptcy, with the exception of—a Debts due to the Crown:

b Debts with which the bankrupt stands charged at the suit of the Crown or of any person for any offence against a statute relating to any branch of the public revenue, or at the suit of the sheriff or other public officer on a bail bond entered in for the appearance of any person prosecuted for any such offence.

And he is not to be discharged for such excepted debts unless the Commissioners of the Treasury certify in writing their consent to his being discharged therefrom (section 49).

11. All goods and chattels which, at the commencement of the bankruptcy, are in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, being a trader, by the consent and permission of the true owner, of which goods and chattels the bankrupt is reputed owner, or of which he has taken upon himself the sale or disposition as owner, are to be divided among the creditors as his property (Section 15). But no choses in action are to be deemed goods and chattels within the meaning of this clause, except debts due in the course of trade or business.

12. When any property of the bankrupt acquired by the trustee consists of land of any tenure burdened with onerous covenants, of unmarketable shares in companies, of unprofitable contracts, or of any other property that is unsaleable or not readily saleable by reason of its binding the possessor thereof to the performance of any onerous act, or to the payment of any sum of money, the trustee, notwithstanding he has endeavoured to sell, or has taken possession of such property, or exercised any act of ownership in relation thereto, may, by writing under his hand, disclaim such property, and upon the execution of such disclaimer the property disclaimed shall, if contract, be deemed to be determined from the date of the order of adjudication; and if a lease, it shall be deemed to have been surrendered on the same date; and if shares in any company, they shall be deemed to be forfeited from that date; and if any other species of property, it shall revert to the person entitled on the determination of the estate or interest of the bankrupt, but if there shall be no person in existence so entitled, then in no case shall any estate or interest therein remain in the bankrupt. Any person interested in any disclaimed property may apply to the Court, and the Court may, upon such application, order possession of the disclaimed property to be delivered up to him, or make such other order as to the possession thereof as may be just.

Any person injured by the operation of this section shall be deemed a creditor of the bankrupt to the extent of such injury, and may accordingly prove the same as a debt under the bankruptcy (Section 23).

13. Demands in the nature of unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of a contract or promise, are not provable in bankruptcy under the new Act, and no person having notice of any act of bankruptcy available for adjudication against the bankrupt, shall prove for any debt or liability contracted by the bankrupt subsequently to the date of his so having notice (Section 31).

V.—CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

(By E. A. C. SCHALCH, Barrister-at-Law.)

1. A public crime is defined by Blackstone to be "a breach and violation of the public rights and duties due to the whole community, considered as a community in its social aggregate capacity;" and a civil injury as "an infringement or privation of the civil rights which belong to individuals": 4 Bla. Com. 5. The substantial distinction between crimes and civil injuries is, however, the mode in which they are pursued, and the object of the procedure. Persons committing crimes are liable to proceedings in the name of the State, and the object of such proceedings is punishment alone. Persons committing civil injuries are liable to proceedings at the suit of the person injured, and the object of the the proceedings is compensation for the injury. Those acts which render the person committing them liable to the former kind of proceedings are crimes; those creating a liability to the latter kind of proceedings are civil injuries. The distinction between crimes and civil injuries is for the most part purely arbitrary.

2. The principal courts of criminal jurisdiction are the Court of Queen's Bench, the Courts of Quarter Sessions, Petty Sessions and Borough Courts, the Central Criminal Court, the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved. The House of Lords is also a criminal court for the trial of peers in cases of felony, and for the trial of impeachments.

3. Judges at assizes usually sit under five several authorities: 1. A commission of assize. 2. A commission of Nisi Prius. 3. Commission of the peace. 4. A commission of oyer and terminer. 5. A commission of general goal delivery. The two first commissions are chiefly of a civil nature, although the justices sitting under them have a criminal jurisdiction in certain special cases. Under the commission of the peace they have a criminal jurisdiction but the most important criminal jurisdiction is given by the two last commissions. By the commission of oyer and terminer they have jurisdiction to hear and determine all treasons, felonies, and misdemeanours. By the commission of general goal delivery, they are empowered to try and deliver every person who shall be in the gaol when the judges arrive at the circuit town.

4. The jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court extends over the City of London and the County of Middlesex, and certain parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, and also over all offences committed on the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty.

The Court of Quarter Sessions is held in every county once in every quarter of a year. The sessions for the county of Middlesex are specially regulated by statute, and are held twice in every month.

6. A grand jury must consist of not less than twelve and not more than twenty-three.

7. Twelve of the grand jury must agree in finding a bill.

8. Generally all voluntary confessions are receivable in evidence on being proved like other facts. If the confessions are not voluntary, they are not admissible as evidence against the prisoner. If, for instance, they have been extorted by fear, or by some inducement held out to the prisoner by some one having authority over him in connection with the prosecution.

9. Yes. Such information may be used when it is found to be true, because being thus confirmed by other facts, its truth is proved by such facts, and it is shown not to have been fabricated in consequence of any inducement. It is therefore competent to prove that the prisoner stated that a particular article would be found by searching at a particular place, and that it was so found, although it might not be competent to inquire whether he had confessed that it was there.

10. Obtaining money under false pretences is a misdemeanour by section 88 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, which enacts that "whosoever shall by any false pretence obtain from any other person any chattel, money or valuable security with intent to defraud shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." This crime differs from larceny; thus, in larceny the owner of the thing stolen has no intention to part with his property therein to the person taking it; when the crime of obtaining money under false pretences is committed, the owner has an intention to part with his property, but such intention is produced by fraud. It is of the essence of larceny that there should be a "taking" of the goods. A "taking" is not necessary to constitute the crime of obtaining money or goods on false pretences.

On an indictment for obtaining money under false pretences under section 88 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, the prisoner may be found guilty of larceny in obtaining the money or goods if the facts proved show that that crime was in fact committed.

11. By section 16 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, it is made a felony to send letters containing threats of murder; the punishment under this section is penal servitude for not exceeding ten years and not less than three years, or imprisonment for not less than two years with or without hard labour, and with or without solitary confinement, and if a male under sixteen with or without whipping. This punishment is now subject to 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2. By section 50 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, it is felony to send letters threatening to burn houses, stacks of grain, or other agricultural produce. The punishment the same as in the case of letters threatening to murder.

12. The stealing of title deeds was not a larceny at common law, on the principle that they savoured of the realty—that is, were part of the land to which they related. At common law nothing which savoured of the realty was the subject of larceny. The stealing of title deeds is now a felony by section 28 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

12. A conspiracy must be by two persons at least; one cannot be convicted of it unless he have been indicted for conspiracy with persons unknown; but one person alone may be tried for a conspiracy provided the indictment charge him with conspiracy with others who have not appeared or who are since dead.

13. There can only be accessories in the case of felonies. In treasons and in misdemeanours all are principals if guilty at all.

14. It must be proved by the oath or affirmation of any credible witness that the witness is dead, and that such deposition was taken in the presence of the person accused, and that he or his counsel or attorney had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness, and if such deposition purport to be signed by the justice by or before whom the same purports to have been taken, such deposition may be read without further proof thereof unless it shall be proved that such deposition was not in fact signed by the justice purporting to sign the same.

EXAMINATION AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The Intermediate Examination of Candidates, under articles of clerkship, took place at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, London, on Thursday the 20th inst. The examiners were the Master Templer, of the Court of Exchequer, Mr. J. M. Clabon, Mr. Alfred Bell, and Mr. F. H. Janson.

I.—FROM CHITTY ON CONTRACTS.

1. What are the different kinds of contract, and how are they classified?

2. What in the language of our law does the term "contract" comprise?

3. What is the exception to the rule "that both parties must be bound or that neither is liable," in the case of an infant?

4. What is the meaning of the word "consideration" in a simple contract, and explain the maxim "ex nudo pacto non oritur actio."

5. State the general rule of law as to the liability of the husband upon his wife's contracts during coverture.

6. What is the legal liability of a common carrier by the common law of the realm, in the case of goods delivered to him to carry?

7. Could an action at common law be maintained on a wager, and how is this now affected by statute law?

II.—FROM WILLIAMS ON THE PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

8. Why, on a mortgage, is the possession of the deeds important?

9. What is the proper length of title to an advowson, and why is it longer than in other cases?

10. What is the difference between the covenants for title by a vendor and a mortgagor?

11. A first mortgagee, having the legal estate, takes a further charge. Does this give him priority over an intermediate second mortgagee?

12. What is the effect of a deposit of deeds, without writing, with a person advancing money to the depositor?

13. What powers have been made incident by statute to a mortgage?

14. Describe a mortgagee's remedies on non-payment, where he has no power of sale; and can he have the property sold by any means?

III.—FROM J. W. SMITH'S MANUAL OF EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE.

15. If a parol agreement be intended to be reduced into writing according to the statute, but the fraud of one of the parties has prevented its being reduced into writing, can a court of equity enforce such parol agreement?

16. A property is settled to the separate use of a then married woman during her life, with a restriction against anticipation by her, such separate use clause and restriction against anticipation being expressly made applicable to all her future covertures. She becomes a widow, and afterwards marries again, no settlement or deed whatever being made on her second marriage. Will she, or not, be entitled to the benefit of the separate use clause as against her second husband?

17. Where gifts or legacies are bestowed on persons on condition that they shall marry with the consent of parents, guardians, or other confidential persons, and such consent be refused, from fraudulent, corrupt, or unconscientious motives, will a court of equity interfere, and if so, with what object?

18. Define "an open account," and distinguish it from "a stated account."

19. Define "a constructive trust."

20. Suppose an executor by mistake, but bonâ fide and without fault, to have paid legatees before a discharge of all debts, would such legatees be under any, and what liabilities?

21. Suppose annuitants to be scheduled to a trust deed but not to be made parties to the deed, do such annuitants acquire a lien upon the trust estate?

IV.—BOOK KEEPING.

22. State the general objects to be attained by book keeping.

23. What is understood by a "profit and loss account," and how is it framed?

24. Give the names of the principal books of account required in ordinary book keeping?
25. What is the meaning of a rest in an account stated?
26. Describe the nature and object of a ledger, and give a short specimen of a ledger account?

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

Our readers, so many of whom have offices in the vicinity of Lincoln's-inn-fields, may be usefully informed that a telegraph station is now open at the Chancery-lane Post-office. On Thursday, January 6th, the business of the Electric and International Company was transferred to, and messages were despatched from, the West Central Post-office, Southampton-street, Holborn; and, by the end of the month, other Governmental offices will be opened in the vicinity, of which our readers shall be apprised.

COURT PAPERS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

ORDER OF COURT.—Jan. 18.

Whereas from the present state of the business before the Lord Chancellor and Master of the Rolls respectively, it is expedient that a portion of the causes set down before the Lord Chancellor to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, and before the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Milbourne James, should be respectively transferred to the Master of the Rolls' book of causes for hearing: Now I do hereby, at the request of the Master of the Rolls, order that the several causes set forth in the first schedule, hereunto subjoined, be accordingly transferred from the book of causes of the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins to that of the Master of the Rolls; and that the several causes set forth in the second schedule, hereunto subjoined, be transferred from the book of causes of the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Milbourne James to that of the Master of the Rolls. And I do further order that all causes so to be transferred (although the bills in such causes may have been marked respectively for the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, or the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Milbourne James, under Order VI. of the Consolidated Orders of this Court, and notwithstanding any orders therein made by the said Vice-Chancellors respectively, or their respective predecessors, shall hereafter be considered and taken as causes originally marked for the Master of the Rolls, and be subject to the same regulations as all causes marked for the Master of the Rolls are subject to by the same orders; provided nevertheless that no order made by the said Vice-Chancellors respectively, or their respective predecessors, in any such causes shall be varied or reversed, otherwise than by the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices. And this order is to be drawn up by the Registrar, and set up in the several offices of this Court.

HATHERLEY, C.

Whereas by The County Courts Act, 1856, s. 79, it was enacted, that the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, from time to time, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, might lessen or increase the fees which were specified in schedule (C.) to that Act, or which were then payable on proceedings in the county courts taken under any Act not thereinbefore recited, and might substitute other fees in lieu thereof, or might order new fees to be paid on any proceedings which were then, or should thereafter be authorised to be taken in such courts, whether any fee was then payable thereon or not.

And whereas proceedings are authorised to be taken in such courts by the Debtors Act, 1869.

In pursuance of the power given by the above-recited Act, we, the undersigned, two of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do hereby, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor, order that, on and after the 1st day of January 1870, the several fees, or sums in the name of fees, specified in the Schedule hereunder written, shall be taken on the proceedings therein mentioned; and that the fees so authorised to be taken shall be received by the registrars of the different county courts, and shall be accounted for and paid over by them to the treasurers of their respective courts.

LANSLOWNE.
W. H. GLADSTONE.

I approve of the annexed Schedule of Fees.
HATHERLEY, C.

22nd December, 1869.

* Not exceeding six weeks.

SCHEDULE.

For every judgment summons under the Debtors Act, 1869, threepence in the pound on so much of the amount of the original demand as, in obedience to the order of the Court, should have been paid at the time of the issue of the summons.

Where such last-mentioned amount does not exceed twenty shillings, an additional fee of sixpence; and where such amount does exceed twenty shillings, an additional fee of one shilling.

For every hearing of the matters mentioned in such judgment summons, sixpence in the pound on the amount upon which the fee on the summons is calculated.

For issuing every order of commitment, eighteenpence in the pound on the amount upon which the fee on the summons is calculated.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

At the beginning of the past week all the markets opened with dullness, which increased as time went on. The funds are still very heavy, but railways and foreign securities have experienced this day an improvement. The former now show some firmness, but the latter are still extremely sensitive to any depressing influence. The most business done in any one direction has been in Bank and telegraph shares.

We are requested to state that the subscription list for the shares of the Land and Sea Telegraph Construction Company will close on Monday, 24th inst., for London, and Tuesday, 25th, for the country.

The Home Secretary, acting on a memorial from the Town Council of Wakefield, has granted a separate Commission of the Peace for that borough.

The following gentleman of the Irish Bar have been elected Benchers of King's Inns, Dublin, to fill existing vacancies:—Mr. James A. Wall, Q.C.; Mr. Patrick J. Blake, Q.C.; Mr. James Robinson, Q.C.; and Mr. Hugh Law, Q.C.

THE NEW JUDGE.—It is probable, we understand, that the vacant seat on the Bench of the Court of Session will be filled by the appointment of Mr. Adam Gifford, Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland.—Scotsman.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 26th of January, at 8 p.m., when Mr. H. R. Droop will read a paper on "The Property Rights of Married Women." Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., M.P., will preside. The council will meet at half-past 7.

BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, AND DEATHS.

BIRTHS.

LOPES—On Jan. 16, at 3, Cromwell-place, S. Kensington, the wife of Henry C. Lopes, Esq., Q.C., M.P., of a daughter.
MACKONCHIE—On Jan. 19, at Great Marlow, the wife of James Mackonochie, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, of a son.

MARRIAGES.

BUHOT-WATTLEY—On Dec. 1, 1869, at Scarborough Church, Island of Tobago, the Honourable W. I. Buhot, M.D., M.R.C.S. England, and A.D.C. to His Excellency the Lieut.-Governor, to Elizabeth Woodley Wattley, eldest daughter of His Honour the Chief Justice.
DANIELL-BAYNES—On Jan. 13, at St. John's Parish Church, Hampstead, James Livett Daniell, Esq., Solicitor, of Bristol, to Sophie Day, second daughter of John Ash Baynes, Esq., of Hampstead-hill-gardens.
JONES-RALPHS—On Jan. 13, at St. Bride's Church, Liverpool, E. Wynne Jones, Solicitor, Chester, to Emily Ann, daughter of the late Thomas Ralphs, Esq., of Liverpool.
MARSDEN-HARRIS—On Jan. 20, at St. George's, Hanover-square, J. Ben Marsden, Solicitor, of 8, King's-road, Bedford-row, to Sarah Ann, widow of the late O. H. C. Harris, Esq., of Wootton Hall, Northamptonshire.
WHEATCROFT-WOODCOCK—On Jan. 6, at St. Peter's-at-Arches, Lincoln, W. G. Wheatcroft, Esq., Solicitor, Matlock, to Mary, eldest daughter of the late F. A. Lowe, Esq., of Gainsborough, and widow of C. C. Woodcock, Esq.

DEATHS.

ATWOOD—On Jan. 16, Anne, the wife of J. J. Atwood, Solicitor, Aberystwith, aged 60.
DUCKETT—On Jan. 11, at Dinan, France, Thomas Morton Duckett, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, in his 53rd year.
HEATON—On Jan. 17, at Lancaster-gate, Maximilian Mowbray, infant son of G. W. Heaton, Barrister-at-Law, aged four months.
MEREWEATHER—On Jan. 18, at Bowden Hill, Wilts, Maria, the wife of Henry Alworth Mereweather, Esq., Q.C.

BREAKFAST.—EPH'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite. The "Civil Service Gazette" remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills." Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in tin-lined packets, labelled—JAMES EPPS & CO., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.—(ADVT.)

LONDON, JANUARY, 29, 1870.

THE ANOMALIES and discrepancies in county court law and practice have been of late frequent subjects of comment in our pages. Here is an anomaly which, in a small way, is perhaps as extraordinary as any that has been hitherto mentioned. By Rule of Practice No. 50 a summons which has not been served may be reissued, under certain circumstances, without the payment of a further court fee. The cases in which these reissues are allowed are cases in which the non-service has not arisen out of any negligence on the part of the plaintiff in issuing the original summons. Under section 2 of the County Courts Act, 1867, a summons on a claim for goods sold to be dealt with in the way of defendant's trade may be served personally, and judgment entered by default if there is no notice of defence given. Some of the Courts decline to re-issue summonses under section 2, in spite of the provisions of rule 50, and demand a fresh fee if a second summons is issued in consequence of the non-service of the first. It sometimes happens that not only a second but a third summons is required in consequence of non-service, and this is more likely to be the case when service is required to be personal. Taking a case, then, where a third summons has been necessary, for say £20, we have this extraordinary difference in the practice of the courts:—if the summons is taken at Lambeth, for example, the fee of £1 3s. covers all the three "successive summonses," as rule 50 calls them, but at Southwark or Wandsworth the fee is charged three times over; and, as only one fee can be charged to the defendant, the plaintiff loses the other two! No time should be lost in setting right so extraordinary a difference in practice as this.

THE ARGUMENT OF AN important case, Reg. v. Stainer, was commenced last Saturday in the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved. The argument is to be continued to-day. The point involved is whether an officer of a friendly society, some of whose rules are in restraint of trade, although not dealing with strikes, is liable to an indictment for embezzling money of the society, which he has received on their account, in the ordinary course of the business of the society. This point has, we believe, never received judicial consideration in any reported case. In the recent decisions of Hornby v. Close (15 W. R. 336) and Farrer v. Close (17 W. R. 1129), a somewhat similar question was discussed, viz., whether friendly societies, some of whose rules were for the support of strikes, and in that sense in restraint of trade, could take advantage of a section (section 44) of the Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), which enables friendly societies to take summary proceedings against persons misappropriating their funds.

The result of these cases is that, although in Farrer v. Close, the Court of Queen's Bench was equally divided, societies whose rules are in restraint of trade are excluded from the benefit of this section. 32 & 33 Vict. c. 61, while it remains in force (for it expires at the end of this year), provides for such cases as those of Hornby v. Close and Farrer v. Close, and extends the section of the Friendly Societies Act to societies having rules as to the terms on which their members will employ or be employed, although such rules may operate in restraint of trade. Neither this statute nor these cases therefore settle the point in issue in Reg. v. Stainer, although they may doubtless afford materials for argument on the question as to what principles should govern the decision in Reg. v. Stainer.

THE FOLLOWING reaches us from an official source:—

"Probably the practical effect of the new system of collecting the Queen's taxes may be more easily apprehended by contrasting the actual working of the method hitherto in force with that now coming into operation.

"Suppose the case of an individual assessed under Schedule D. of the Income Tax Act for the year 1869-70. the duty payable by whom shall amount to £20 for the whole year; under the system heretofore in force £10 of that sum would have been collected in October or November, 1869, £5 would become payable about February, 1870, and the remaining £5 in April, 1870. On each of these several occasions the collector would give a receipt for the amount paid and would afterwards account to the proper officer for each sum so received; under the new system, no demand is made until January, 1870, when the whole £20 is collected in one sum and at once accounted for to the Revenue, and no further demand will be made upon the party until January, 1871, when the income tax duty for 1870-71, will, in its turn, be in like manner collected in one sum; it is obvious that this simplification of the mode of collection will diminish the labours of the officers engaged therein by two thirds, whilst a considerable economy will be effected and much complication avoided by the diminution of the number of official receipts and other forms hitherto used in collecting and accounting for the duties.

"The effect as regards the inhabited house duty will be similar, but the case is somewhat different in reference to the general duties of assessed taxes. Hitherto, the assessed taxes have been charged and accounted for in the following manner.

"Take, again, the case of an individual liable to those duties for the year 1869-70.

"Early in April, 1869, the party was required to make a return of the greatest number of taxable articles kept or used by him within the preceding year, commencing 6th April, 1868, and ending 5th April, 1869. Having made the required return an assessment was made in accordance with the party's liability. Payment of the first moiety of that assessment was demanded in October or November, 1869, and the second moiety will be required to be paid in April, 1870; and here a certain hardship will undoubtedly arise, owing to the introduction of the new plan of charging and paying the assessed taxes by means of licences, inasmuch as the party will be required to pay the licence duty in January, 1870, for the articles he actually has in use at that period. This will clear him, so far as regards those articles, until January, 1870, but the second moiety of the assessment of 1869 will still be outstanding and payable in April, 1870.

"Thus—

"Amount of assessment,
1869-70, say £20	...	First moiety, paid
		October, 1869	£10
do. do.	...	Second moiety, payable April,
		1870	£10
			£20

"Assessed tax licence, 1870-71, payable
January, 1870 ... say £20"

This is a correct explanation of the new and old laws on this matter; but, as the reader who perused our article on the subject (ante p. 123) will see, it involves an assumption which has been at the bottom of most of the popular misconception of the matter, and which, in all probability, is accountable of the non-comprehension by the public of the explanation put forth by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It narrates, so far as the collection of the income tax and inhabited house duty is concerned, what was the proper system of collection, but not that which was commonly adopted. In practice the three applications were not made. In London, as far as our experience goes, only one was made, and printed forms were used, showing at what times the moiety was payable, which forms were generally served about midway between those times. This was the practice, at any rate, in the case of all persons whose credit was reasonably good. The explanation which we have printed at the head of this notice describes accurately the times when the duties used to be payable, but not those in which they used in practice to be paid. Thus the tax collectors appear, in one respect, to have anticipated the new scheme by collecting all the portions in one sum; but the consequence was that they could not get it till the end of the year.

MANY OF OUR READERS will peruse with interest the observations of Sir Roundell Palmer, which we reprint in another column, on the Married Women's Property question. Sir Roundell Palmer's view of any proposal to alter the law is always cool and singularly keen and far reaching. There is almost as much partisanship, and almost as many shibboleths are heard, on topics of social as on those of political reform. Anything, therefore, which falls from Sir Roundell Palmer is grateful, both for its authority and as a relief in contrast to multitudes of more or less hasty and imperfectly considered utterances. Upon the married women's property question Sir R. Palmer fears that legislation in the spirit proposed by the extreme "rights of women" sect would be no benefit to any one. We certainly agree with this view,* believing that such a social revolution as that proposed by the Bill of 1868 would let in seventy evils to cure one. We further agree with Sir R. Palmer in disapproving of the principle, contended for by some, of rendering wives independent of their husbands, and we believe that a considerable part of the random utterances on this point are owing to their authors never having calmly considered the extent to which protection of the wife's property is possible. You may tie up separate property or earnings as tightly as you will, in principle; but as to instalments of income, wherever husband and wife live together, no legislation on earth can guarantee that the husband shall not be able to get hold of the actual shillings, if he is so minded and strong enough. In order to put the property out of the husband's power, you must put it out of her own.

Sir R. Palmer agrees that, among the poor, some provision is necessary for securing to the wife a better facility for obtaining the protection already extended in part by the Matrimonial Act. No doubt some provision of this description would touch the matter nearly, but we do not think it would supply all the need. And we repeat our former opinion that the Gordian knot is to be untied (we disclaim any desire to have it cut) by borrowing from France some modification of the separation des biens, under which all the wife's property remains her own, the husband being, as long as they live together, sole administrateur.

UNDER THE COUNTY COURTS ACT (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95) a creditor had to go to the debtor's district to obtain a summons; so that a debtor, for a trifling sum, was almost safe against proceedings, provided he lived at a considerable distance from his creditors, as creditors seldom thought it worth their while to enforce a claim in distant courts. Subsequent legislation has been more favourable to creditors in allowing them, under certain conditions to summon debtors from a distance. The Act of 1867 (section 1) carried this principle further than it had been carried before by allowing a debtor to be sued "where the cause of action wholly or in part arose." Under this section the mere receipt of an order for goods has been generally held to be "part of the cause of action," although the purchaser might live hundreds of miles away, and might never have been within the district to which he might subsequently be summoned by virtue of the receipt of the order within it. This section seems to have worked well for two years, and no attempt has been made to disturb the arrangement, but the operation of a similar section relating to judgment summons is now imperilled. By section 18 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, any of the nine metropolitan courts (excluding the City court) were empowered to send common summonses to each other districts for service, without leave of the Court, which was required previously. This was practically treating the metropolis as one district, as each high bailiff of a metropolitan court became bailiff, for this purpose, of all the other metropolitan courts, to the great convenience of plaintiffs, as they previously had to wait for days, sometimes (as in vacation) for weeks, for the sitting of the Court, to obtain leave.

By section 3 of the Act of 1867, the same rule was applied to judgment summonses, the City court being added to the nine metropolitan courts to comprise the metropolitan district. Hence, for two years, plaintiffs could issue judgment summonses in their own districts, and have them served in any part of London without leave of the Court. No. 2 of the new Rules has now laid down that "A judgment summons shall not be issued by a Court unless the debtor resides or carries on business within its district, or unless by leave of the Court under section 48 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108." That section 48 provides that in all cases of judgment summonses to be served in another district, leave of the Court must be obtained; and the drawer of the rules seems to have treated this as the most recent statute on the subject, ignoring altogether the 3rd section of the Act of 1867.

The point was raised before one of the metropolitan judges this week, when he at once said the Committee of County Court Judges were not empowered to make rules setting aside Acts of Parliament, and consequently, Rule No. 2 was of no effect. The application was for a judgment summons to be sent to another metropolitan district for service, and the judge said, that although leave was not necessary he would grant it, to obviate the difficulty that might arise from the officers of other districts acting upon the rule and not upon the Act of Parliament. He granted leave in the particular case, but gave general leave in all such cases without plaintiffs being put to the inconvenience of applying to the Court. Thus section 3 is repealed by Rule 2, but Rule 2 is repealed by order of a judge, at least so far as his court is concerned.

We have stated the point as we gather it to have been presented to the judge above mentioned, but it is possible that the framers of the new Rules may have proceeded upon the assumption that section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, by substituting its own provisions for those of sections 98 and 99 of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, may have repealed by implication section 3 of the County Courts Act, 1867.

SOME FEW WEEKS SINCE we had occasion to notice a concern called the "West Kent Mercantile Institute" at Greenwich, consisting of a solicitor named Elworthy, and his father. The institute has appeared during the present month as a plaintiff in the Greenwich County Court, suing one of its clients for £8 odd for professional services, including negotiation for a loan. It appeared from the evidence, as commented upon by the judge, that the institute did not keep its solicitor's diary as it should be kept. As to the claim for the loan negotiation, the judge dismissed it with costs. The prospectus of the institute stated that agencies had been opened in all the principal towns in the kingdom. In our former remarks we queried the names of the solicitors conducting the agencies. Mr. Elworthy, jun., when examined on this point, declined to give any further details than that on being entrusted with any business in any town he would select a name out of the Law List, which would constitute an agency. It appeared that Mr. Elworthy, jun., was solicitor to the institute, Mr. Elworthy, sen., being secretary, surveyor, and his clerk. We trust the Incorporated Law Society has its eye on this pair.

VICE-CHANCELLOR MALINS has consented to preside at the ensuing Anniversary Festival of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, which is appointed to take place on Wednesday, the 15th of June next, at the Freemasons' Tavern, London.

ACTIONS AGAINST CARRIERS.

No. I.

The contract with a carrier for the carriage of goods has this peculiarity—that there are usually three parties concerned in the contract—viz., the consignor, the carrier, and the consignee. The carrier knows necessarily of the existence of the consignor and the consignee, and usually their names also, but he is ignorant of the relations that exist between them, and he knows nothing as to the ownership of the goods. When a carrier is liable to an action for not properly carrying the goods entrusted to him for carriage, it often becomes a difficult question to determine in whose name the action ought to be brought, whether in that of the consignor or of the consignee. The rule most generally laid down is that the action should be brought in the name of the person who has the property in the goods, whether he was the consignor or consignee (Smith's Merc. Law, 7th ed. p. 292, Chitty & Temple, 124). In Coombs v. The Bristol, &c., Railway Company (6 W. R. 726), Watson, B., says—"The right to sue the carrier depends upon the question in whom the property in the goods is."

If the cases upon which this rule purports to be based are examined, it will be found that the rule is not correctly stated. There is no dispute in these cases that the action against the carrier for neglect of his engagement to carry is one substantially of contract. The language, however, of the judgments in several cases might lead one to suppose that the rights on breach of contract for carriage are different from those which arise on the breach of other contracts.

Usually on the breach of a simple contract the person entitled to sue for such breach is the person with whom the contract was made; the person from whom the consideration moved, and to whom the promise was made. If on the breach of a contract of carriage the owner of the goods carried qua owner were the proper person to sue and not the person with whom the contract was made, these contracts would be of a most anomalous nature and would give rise to rights very different in principle from those springing from other contracts. There is, however, no authority for such a proposition concerning contracts for the carriage of goods, and indeed the cases which are most frequently cited to establish the rule before stated really prove that these contracts are subject to the same principles as all other contracts. The rules, therefore, for ascertaining the proper person to be plaintiff in an action for a breach of contract of carriage are the same as on the breach of any other simple contract. He is entitled to sue from whom the consideration proceeds and to whom the promise is made.

The rule that the ownership of the goods determines the right to sue on the contract has arisen from a confusion between the right to sue and the evidence by which that right is proved. The right to sue depends upon contract. The proof that the contract sued upon was made with the plaintiff is frequently established by showing that he was the owner of the goods which were to be carried. If A. order goods of B. of a particular kind, and direct B. to send them to him by a particular carrier, and B. executes the order correctly, and the property in the goods vests in A. on delivery to the carrier, A. is usually the proper person to sue the carrier for negligence in the carriage of the goods. If, however, B. sends goods of a kind different from that ordered by A., so that A. is not bound to and does not accept such goods, B. would usually be the proper person to sue. There is no doubt about this proposition, and it is also clear that the proper person to sue in each of these cases would be the person who is the owner of the goods. In the decisions establishing these propositions the right of action is generally treated as if it depended upon the ownership of the goods, but it is obvious that in each of these cases the contract for carriage is in fact with the owner of the goods.

In the case first put A. undoubtedly does authorise B. to send the goods, and, therefore, contracts with the carrier through his agent B. In the second case, A. does not authorise the sending of such goods as B. in fact sends, and consequently makes no contract with the carrier. In this latter case, therefore, the contract, as a matter of fact, is between B. and the carrier. Thus the right of action in both cases springs from a contract proved as a matter of fact, but the ownership of the goods would be important evidence to establish the existence of the contract. Of course, in either of these cases, evidence in addition to the facts we have supposed might alter the legal rights by showing that some contract existed different from that which appeared at first sight.

It must also be remembered that a consignor delivering goods to a carrier for a consignee, who is the owner, may or may not so act as to create a contract between himself and the carrier. The mere fact, however, of delivering goods to a carrier to be carried does not necessarily show any contract between the consignor and the carrier. The carrier may, and often does look exclusively to the consignee for payment, and relies on his right of lien to enforce that payment. Whether or not there is a contract between the consignor only and carrier, or between the consignee only and carrier, or whether there is a contract between the consignee and the carrier, on which either the consignee, the principal, or the consignor, the agent, can sue, is really a question of fact and not of law. It is a fact to be decided like any other fact—viz., by the jury. The confusion between the right of action and the evidence of the contract which gives the right of action, has caused considerable difficulty in cases where this subject has been discussed. When, however, the decisions in these cases are closely examined, it will be found that they may all be reconciled with the adoption of the ordinary principles of the law of contract, although there are dicta which cannot be so readily explained.

One of the earliest cases in which the question whether the consignor or consignee of goods is the proper person to sue for a breach of the contract of carriage is Davis v. James (5 Burr. 2680), decided 1770. That was an action by a consignor who paid for the carriage of the goods against a carrier for breach of the contract. The property of the goods was in the consignee, and it was argued that the consignee was the proper plaintiff, and not the consignor. Lord Mansfield, however, said in giving judgment, "the vesting of the property may differ according to the circumstances of cases, but it does not enter into the present question. This is an action upon the agreement between the plaintiff and the carrier. The plaintiffs were to pay him. Therefore the action is properly brought by the person who agreed with him, and was to pay him." Moore v. Wilson (1 T. R. 659) is to the same effect. There there was an agreement in fact between the consignor and the carrier, although as between the consignor and the consignee the latter was to pay for the carriage. The consignor was held to be the right person to sue.

In Daves v. Peck (8 T. R. 330) a consignor, the property in the goods being in the consignee, was held unable to sue, and the judgment might appear to be based on the fact that the consignor had no property in the goods. This, however, is not the real ratio decidendi, because both Davis v. James and Moore v. Wilson are referred to and approved, but distinguished on the ground that there the consignor paid for the carriage. In other words, in those two cases a contract between the consignee and the carrier was proved, but no such contract was proved in Daves v. Peck, and, therefore, the plaintiff was non-suited.

Joseph v. Knox (3 Camp. 320) shows very clearly that the right of action against a carrier depends upon the question with whom was the contract made. The action was on a bill of lading by a consignee against a carrier for non-delivery. The property in the goods was in the consignee. Held, that the action lay because "there is privity of contract between these parties (the plaintiff and the defendant) by means of the bill of lading. That states that the goods were shipped by the plaintiffs, and that the freight for them was paid by the plaintiffs. To the plaintiffs therefore from whom the consideration comes, and to whom the promise is made, the defendant is liable for the non-delivery of the goods. After such a bill of lading has been signed by his agent he cannot say to the shippers they have no interest in the goods and are not damaged by his breach of contract. I think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the value of the goods, and they will hold the sum recovered as trustees for the real owners."

In Sargent v. Morris (3 B. & Ald. 276) a consignee of goods by bill of lading was held not entitled to sue. There was no contract in fact by him with the carriers, as under the circumstances, the consignors could not in any sense be considered as his agents to make the contract of carriage with the carriers for him.

Frayano v. Long, 4 B. & C. 219, shows that a consignee, the owner of goods which had been sent to him by his directions, can sue the carriers for negligence in the carriage. There the property was in the consignee, and the right of action is spoken of as depending upon the right of property, but it will be seen that there was clearly a contract between the carriers and the plaintiff, through the plaintiff's agents, the shippers. To the same effect is Swain v. Shepherd (1 M. & Rob. 224) where the consignor of goods sent "on sale or return" was held entitled to sue the carriers for negligence. In Coats v. Chaplain (3 Q. B. 483), the consignor was also held entitled to sue. He had sent goods to a consignee by the consignee's order, but the Statute of Frauds had not been complied with and the goods were lost on the road. In these two cases there was clearly a contract between the consignors and the carriers, and on this ground they were entitled to recover. Coombs v. The Bristol, &c., Railway Company (6 W. R. 726), was the converse of Coats v. Chaplain. The plaintiff in Coombs v. The Bristol, &c., Railway Company was the consignee of goods ordered by him of the consignor, the property in which had not passed to him, as the Statute of Frauds had not been complied with. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover in an action against the carriers for the loss of the goods.

In Freeman v. Birch (1 Nev. & Man. 420) Parke, J., says, during the argument, "the person who employs the carrier must bring the action;" and again, "the circumstance of the legal right being in one person may be evidence of employment by that person." In Dunlop v. Lambert (6 Cl. & Fin. 600), the authorities on this subject are examined and the law is thus stated: "Although generally speaking where there is a delivery to a carrier to deliver to a consignee he is the proper person to bring the action against the carrier should the goods be lost; yet if the consignor made a special contract with the carrier, and the carrier agreed to take the goods from him and to deliver them to any particular person at any particular place, the special contract supercedes the necessity of showing the ownership in the goods, and the consignor, the person making the contract with the carrier, may maintain the action though the goods may be the goods of the consignee."

These are the authorities most frequently referred to when the question, Is the consignor or consignee the proper person to sue? is discussed.

LAW DIGESTS.

While the Legislature has been unable to make up its mind to do anything decided upon the great subject of a complete digest of the law, private enterprise has been endeavouring to supply the public from time to time, in a very unambitious form, and to a limited extent, with some of the advantages which would be derived from larger schemes. Though digests of the whole law cannot be had, digests of the case law decided during certain periods are pretty numerous. The Weekly Reporter Digest of cases decided within the year is issued at the close of each yearly volume, and embraces the reports of all the four series now published. Mr. Fisher's Digest, formerly published in connection with the Jurist, is still issued annually. The Law Times has its Digest. The Law Journal likewise publishes its periodical Digests, though they appear at longer intervals than those we have mentioned. These various Digests are of various degrees of excellence, and we do not propose to discuss their merits here. But they all resemble each other in one point, and that is the general principle upon which they are framed. The plan adopted by all of them has been to select, wherever it was possible, broad general heads, being for the most part heads long known to all lawyers as familiar land marks, such as bankruptcy, landlord and tenant, principal and agent, and the like; then to arrange in convenient groups the cases falling under each of these heads; finally, to complete the work by inserting both for the cases falling under these familiar heads and for others which do not admit of being brought into such large groups, as many cross references under other titles as seem necessary to secure that no one shall look for any point in the Digest in vain. This method of arranging the cases as far as possible under the widest heads to which they are referable, and only referring to them under the words which indicate the smaller details, has always been supposed to secure several advantages; first that any one at all in the habit of using the Digest is pretty sure to find any decision in the first place where he looks for it; secondly, that all the cases upon kindred points will be found together; and thirdly, that if any one of the proper cross references is omitted (and digests of course enjoy no immunity from error), there is no great harm done, for the case will still be found in the place where most people will look for it first and every one will look for it first or last. We will take an imaginary example. Suppose there are five or six cases to be dealt with in which the question was whether certain things were perils of the seas within the meaning of the ordinary policy of insurance. In one the question is as to damage done by rats, in another as to damage done by the leakage of petroleum oil, and so on through the others. In ordinary digests these would all be found together, forming a group of cases under the general head "Insurance," or something of the kind. There would be more references to the place at which the several cases are to be found under the heads "Perils of the sea," "Rats," "Leakage," "Petroleum oil." In this way those who wanted any particular decision, say the one about rats, would find it where he would be most likely to look for it first, and where he would certainly look for it if he did not find it in the place first searched. Any one who wanted to have light on the meaning of "Perils of sea" by seeing all the late decisions upon those words, would find them all collected together. And if, by accident, a cross reference were omitted, say for instance, that under the word "Rats," no great harm would be done; for no one who looked for the case under that word and failed to find it could think of concluding that it was not in the book. Another advantage of the system of grouping may not be quite so obvious at first sight, but is very real. When decisions are thus arranged, the true bearing of each is at once apparent, and there is no danger of supposing any one to have a wider application than it really has. Thus, in our example, the cases on the "Perils of the seas" being all ranged under the head "Insurance," no one could forget that they have to do only with the meaning of those words in a policy, or could suppose that they are conclusive as to their meaning if used anywhere else.

A new digest of cases has lately appeared in the field, issued in connection with the Law Reports. The preparation of a digest must always be an ungrateful and very laborious task; and in the result no reasonable man could ever expect more than an approximation to perfect accuracy. The Law Reports digest is the result, we have no doubt, of diligent labour, and we have no reason to suppose that it is not, at least as free from error as any other digest formed on the same plan is likely to be. Indeed, as it is a digest only of the cases decided in one set of reports, and is at the same time nearly a year in arrear of several other digests which comprise the cases reported in all, its framers have had an exceptionally easy task, and, therefore, we may presume, have accomplished it with special accuracy. It supplies, for this reason, the better illustration of what we have to say about the principle on which it seems to have been formed. Anyone who takes up this Digest for the first time will see at once that it is not compiled on the ordinary principle. He will turn to the heads "Bankruptcy," "Landlord and Tenant," "Practice," and find not a single case under any of them, but under each a number of mere references to other places. He may not, however, at first sight detect what principle has been adopted in its place. We can, of course, only judge from the result; but from this there can be little doubt that the rule which the compilers have laid down for themselves is the precise reverse of the usual one—namely, to place each case under the lowest and least general head to which it can be referred, giving only references under the higher and more general. Thus the cases which in other digests would be collected and classified under "Bankruptcy" are here to be looked for under "Fire Policy," "Defeating and Delaying Creditors," "Fraudulent Preference," "Unstamped Creditors Deed," and so on. We do not say that this method has been thoroughly adhered to throughout. Sometimes it has been departed from to a remarkable extent; for instance, all the Scotch cases, we believe, in the Digest are mixed together under "Scottish Law." And in the very matter of "Perils of the seas" a middle course has been taken. But, as a general rule, there can be no doubt, we think, that this Digest has been framed upon the principle we have stated; and, as the plan seems to us as unfortunate as it is novel, we shall very briefly examine its working.

The first and most obvious result of this arrangement is that in the vast majority of cases no one will find any point in the first place where he looks for it, for very few people can remember or guess the minutiae of a case sufficiently to look for it at once under the word which expresses its smallest detail. Another effect is, that to anyone who wants to find all the cases falling within any large heading, for the purpose, we will suppose, of noting them up in a text-book or for any similar purpose, this Digest is absolutely useless. If anyone wished to use it for noting up his Daniell's Chancery Practice, he would turn to "Practice in Chancery," and find himself referred to about 180 cases scattered over all parts of the book, and would thereupon give up his attempt in despair. Again, where all attempt at logical arrangement is thus discarded, it must often happen that even the compiler of the Digest himself can see no reason whatever for placing a case under any one of several headings rather than any other. And in such instances even people familiar with the smallest details of the cases could never know where to look for them. A few examples will illustrate what we mean. A case decided that to an action upon a covenant made in consideration of marriage, a plea that the marriage was null and void by reason of impotence, without going further, was a bad plea. That case is neither set out nor referred to under "Husband and Wife," nor even under "Nullity of Marriage;" it is set out under "Plea of Nullity of Marriage." How many people are likely to find that case when they want it? There is a case as to interrogatories in an action for malicious prosecution, another as to interrogatories in an action of slander. Why is one under "Interrogatories" in an action for malicious prosecution," and the other under "Slander"? There is a case deciding that where an incumbent has two churches in one benefice he must hold service in both. Where would anybody expect to find this case? Under "Ecclesiastical Law" perhaps, but there is no clue to it there; under "Clergyman" perhaps, but it is not referred to there; under "Parish" possibly, but there is no reference to it there. It is to be found under "Two Churches in one Benefice." We shall not weary our readers by giving more examples of this class, though we could easily give them by scores. The next fault of this system is that it enormously increases the risk of serious error. Perhaps the worst fault that can be committed in a digest is to separate the decision of a case in the court of first instance from the decision of the same case on appeal, without taking care in some way that no one shall look at the one without being at once sent on to the other. In framing a digest on the ordinary principle this is not likely to occur, for the two decisions must almost necessarily come before the compiler at the same time. But under the new system, if the last catch-word at the head of the report is not the same in both, they will not come before the compiler together, and he is therefore very likely to overlook their connection. In two instances in this Digest we have met with cases decided first in the court below, and afterwards on appeal, in which the two decisions are far apart, and there is no reference from one to the other. Brook v. Badley (in which the question was whether or no a certain testamentary gift was obnoxious to the Mortmain Act), before the Master of the Rolls, is to be found in column 485, under the head "Mining royalty"; the same case, on appeal, in column 612, under the head "Proceeds of sale of real estate": Flamank v. Simpson, in the Arches Court, may be found in column 47 under the head "Appeal to Court of Arches," and the same case before the Privy Council is in column 424, under the head "Jurisdiction of Court of Arches;" and in neither instance is there any reference from one place to the other. These are the only instances we have met with of this particular form of error; we cannot, of course, say whether they are the only instances in the book. But further, the new system risks everything on the perfection of the work, and turns every little oversight of the compiler into a formidable blunder. If, in an ordinary digest, the compiler had made the very oversight we have just been speaking of, and had failed in any way expressly to indicate the identity of the case in the Court below and on appeal, still the two would necessarily have been almost close together, and any one using the digest would have seen their connection, and corrected for himself the oversight of the author. But in the present Digest the omission of a reference is fatal.

All the defects which we have pointed out are, as it seems to us, the natural consequence of the system adopted in the new Digest; and, on the other hand, we are unable to discover any single advantage which it possesses over the old system. We hope so bad an example will not be followed, but of this there is probably little danger.

HIGH COURT OF CALCUTTA.—The following appointments have been made in the High Court (original side), consequent on the resignation of Mr. Theobald:—Mr. R. Belchambers, registrar of the High Court (original jurisdiction), to be taxing officer, accountant-general, and sealer, with power, as registrar, to perform the duties heretofore performed by the prothonotary, and also such of the duties of the Clerk of the Crown as are not connected with the criminal sessions; Mr. A. S. Gaspar to be assistant to the registrar and assistant to the Clerk of the Crown (Mr. C. C. Macrae); and Mr. W. R. Fink to be clerk to the Chief Justice.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

EFFECT OF FORFEITURE OF SHARES.

Creyke's case, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 103.

The fallacy which underlies a good deal of the argument in this and similar cases appears to us to consist in the supposition that shares are absolutely extinguished by the act of forfeiture. Absolutely extinguished they are not, and cannot be, but only in relation to the holder; and they revert back on forfeiture to the company, and form a portion of the unissued capital. If this were not so, there would be an easy way to reduce the capital of a company in spite of the Companies Act, 1862, and without complying with the requirements of the Companies Act, 1867. Forfeiture extinguishes no liability of the holder which existed at the date of the forfeiture; and a person who ceased to be a member of a company, whether by forfeiture or transfer, remains liable for a whole year afterwards to be put on the list as a past member, and pay, after the list of present members is exhausted, his proportionate share of all debts which were due when he ceased to be a member of the company. So far as he is concerned as a contributory on list B, it matters not whether the shares re-vested in the company by forfeiture, or vested in a third party by transfer. Nor does it make a bit of difference, so far as he is concerned, whether the shares were forfeited in his own hands, as in Creyke's case, or in the hands of his transferee, as in Bridger's and Neill's cases (17 W. R. 216, L. R. 4 Ch. 266). The case before us was substantially the same as the last named cases, but was complicated by a clause in the articles of association—"Forfeiture shall extinguish. . . all other rights incident to the share"—but which did not occur in Bridger's and Neill's cases.

Whatever might be the true meaning of these words, they could hardly be read so as to overrule section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862. It must be borne in mind that a contract to take shares implies a contract to pay the full amount due on them at such time and in such manner as the constitution of the company provides; and this liability is one which affects past members, though in a modified degree, equally with present members. How, therefore, if a man is a past member, can it make any difference in his liability, that he became so by the forfeiture of his shares as a penalty for noncompliance with some duty he owed to the company, instead of by transfer to a third party?

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—NOTICE OF TENANCY.

James v. Lichfield, M.R., 18 W. R. 158.

Everything that puts a purchaser on inquiry amounts to notice; and it has long been settled that the occupation of a tenant amounts to notice to the purchaser of the actual interest of the tenant in the property (Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. 437).

A purchaser who takes it for granted that the occupation of a tenant is from year to year only, will never- the less be bound, if it turns out that the tenant enjoys a larger interest, or has an option to purchase (Daniel v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249).

As between tenant and purchaser, then, the purchaser cannot, after notice of a tenancy, set up the defence of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, whatever the actual tenancy or tenant's right may turn out to be. In the case before us the Master of the Rolls decided that the same principle was applicable to cases between vendor and purchaser, as to cases between purchaser and tenant. The purchaser in the present instance was tenant from year to year, and assumed that the remainder of the property contracted to be purchased, which he knew to be in the occupation of A. B., was held upon similar terms. It turned out that A. B. had in his pocket when the contract was made an agreement for a lease for twenty-one years of the portion of the property occupied by him; and the purchaser in consequence filed his bill against the vendor for specific performance with an abatement. If it had been a case of mistake although on the purchaser's part only, and not common to him and the vendor, yet, as the matter rested in contract, and no deed had been executed, the Court might, it seems, have rectified the error (Harris v. Pepperell, 16 W. R. 68, L. R. 5 Eq. 1, as was done in Garrard v. Frankel, 30 Beav. 445), where a person supposed he had entered into a contract for a lease at one rent, and it turned out that the rent specified was of a larger amount. But in the present instance there was no case of mistake, inasmuch as the purchaser was put upon inquiry by his knowledge of the fact of A. B.'s occupation, and therefore specific performance with an abatement was refused.

COMMON LAW.

CHARGES BY RAILWAY COMPANIES FOR CARRIAGE OF GOODS AT A MILEAGE RATE—REASONABLE ROUTE.

Myers v. London and South Western Railway Company, C.P., 18 W. R. 69.

The amount which railway companies may charge for the carriage of goods is regulated by their private and by public statutes. They are generally entitled to charge so much per ton per mile. The question in Myers v. The London and South-Western Railway Company was, is a railway company bound to carry and charge for goods by the most direct route, or may they carry the goods by a longer way and charge per mile over the extended distance? It was decided that "the defendants were not bound to carry the goods by the nearest or most direct route, but that they were only bound to do so by a reasonable and usual route." The point was short and simple, but the decision is of great importance to railway companies who so often have a choice between two lines. The route adopted must be reasonable, but if it is reasonable the mileage rate may be charged over the whole route, although the goods might have been conveyed by a shorter way.

In the judgment the words "usual" and "reasonable" are used as if they were synonymous, and no doubt they often, and perhaps generally, have the same meaning in cases of this sort. There may, however, be a great difference between a "reasonable" route or a "reasonable" time and a route or time which is "usual." That a certain course of business is usual may be evidence that it is reasonable, but it is not necessarily so. It may sometimes be very "reasonable" to depart altogether from the "usual" course of business. That which has been ordinarily done is "usual," and may or may not be "reasonable." That which ought to be done under the special circumstances of each case is "reasonable," and may or may not be "usual." The decision here was that the defendants were entitled to carry by a "reasonable" route, although such route was not the shortest.

EVIDENCE—CONSTRUCTION—HARBOURING DISORDERLY PERSONS.

Murphy v. Ahern, C.P. (Ir.), 18 W. R. 71.

During the past year several cases came before the London magistrates, in which the question was raised, What is sufficient evidence of the offence of allowing prostitutes and other disorderly persons to assemble and continue in refreshment houses? The view that has been taken at the Middlesex Sessions in these cases has been that the ordinary rules of evidence and construction must be strictly applied, and that this offence is not proved by evidence merely that known prostitutes in fact came to a particular refreshment house, and took refreshment there. The same view has been taken by the Irish Court of Common Pleas in Murphy v. Ahern. The decision there was on a different statute, but the point for decision was very similar. 5 Vict. c. 24, s. 7, inflicts a penalty upon the keepers of public-houses, &c., who "knowingly permit or suffer prostitutes or persons of notoriously bad character to meet or remain" on their premises. The Court decided that evidence that about sixteen women, most of whom were prostitutes, were in the appellant's house at one time with a number of soldiers, all taking refreshments, and that the women stayed, on an average, about half an-hour in the house, was not sufficient to prove an offence under the statute, as it was not shown that the women came there for immoral purposes, or were guilty while there of immoral or disorderly conduct. The Court says:—"To justify a conviction it is not enough that prostitutes assembled in the house; the justice must be satisfied also that they met there for the purpose of prostitution, or other disorderly conduct." It was not enough that "it was probable that the assembly would result in breaches of morality or decency."

This case resembles very much several cases that have arisen in London, and it confirms the view that has already been adopted at the Middlesex Sessions.

VERBAL EVIDENCE TO VARY WRITTEN CONTRACTS— PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Abrey v. T. Cruz, C.P., 18 W. R. 63.

The Court of Common Pleas seem to have had some difficulty in applying in this case the well-known rule of evidence that a written contract cannot be varied or contradicted by verbal evidence of a contemporaneous or prior agreement. The action was by the holder of a bill of exchange against the drawer, the acceptor not having paid the bill at maturity. The defendant pleaded that he was a mere surety for the acceptor, and that he drew the bill upon the acceptor as such surety only, as the plaintiff knew, and that it was then agreed between the plaintiff, the defendant, and the acceptor, that the acceptor should deposit certain securities with the plaintiff, which, if the acceptor did not pay the bill, were to be sold by the plaintiff, and the proceeds applied in discharge of the bill, and that, until such sale, the defendant should not be liable upon the bill, and that the securities were duly deposited, but the plaintiff had not sold them. At the trial a verbal agreement, to the effect stated in the plea, was proved. The question was, whether such evidence was admissible, as the agreement was not in writing. It was held that evidence of the agreement was not admissible on the ground, as put by Bovill, C.J., that "the oral agreement stated to have been entered into in the plea goes to contradict the contract stated to have been entered into by the declaration. This oral condition is inadmissible in evidence to qualify the written agreement."

Keating and Brett, JJ., concurred in this view. Willes, J., expressed a doubt as to the propriety of thus deciding. It was, he says, an arrangement "how the surplus of the money owed was to be paid if it turned out that the funds in the holder's hands were not sufficient to satisfy the debt," and in that case the bill was to be enforced in order to pay that surplus. To admit such evidence would be contrary to the ordinary rules, but he thought that an exception to such rules ought in the case of bills of exchange to be made under circumstances like those of the present case.

It might at first sight appear that this case conflicts with those decisions which have established that verbal evidence is admissible to show that a writing which appears a complete contract was yet subject to a condition precedent which has not been performed. The principle, however, of Pym v. Campbell (4 W. R. 520) and Rogers v. Hadley (11 W. R. 1074), which, with other authorities, have established this rule, apply only to cases where a condition precedent has not been performed. The principle of those cases is that there never was in fact any agreement at all between the parties.

If it can be shown that there was a complete agreement between the parties verbal evidence of any condition subsequent is not admissible.

In Abrey v. Cruz the condition alleged in the plea was a condition subsequent. The plea did not allege that the bill was not in fact completely drawn and issued; on the contrary, it admitted that there had been a complete bill on which the acceptor had become liable, but it set up an agreement that the defendant, the drawer (without whom the bill would have been an incomplete instrument), should not be liable unless the plaintiff performed a certain condition. This agreement contradicted the terms of the bill, and therefore could not be proved by verbal evidence.

Although the decision of Abrey v. Cruz merely follows former authorities, the case is remarkable on account of the observations of Willes, J., who seems to have been dissatisfied with the application of the ordinary rules of evidence in a case like this. His objection to their application was apparently that such rules might cause great hardship. This is so no doubt, and the same may be said of almost all rules of evidence, which may sometimes, and probably occasionally do actually obstruct rather than facilitate the object of all evidence—viz., the discovery of the truth. It has, however, been considered that incalculably greater inconvenience would follow if there were no rules to guide the admission of evidence, and the occasional evil is more than compensated for by the general advantage that is secured by the adoption of such rules.

These remarks apply as much to the case of Abrey v. Cruz as to any other case. Willes, J., says, "Great injustice might have arisen if the plaintiff had wilfully destroyed these securities before the bill had become due. He could even then have enforced the bill against the defendant, who would have had no remedy at law." Although any opinion expressed by Willes, J., is deserving of the greatest respect, we cannot help doubting whether he is quite right in this instance. It has been held that if a creditor has securities in his possession, and loses them or gives them up to the debtor, the surety will, to the extent of such securities, be discharged (W. & H. L. C., 832, 2nd ed., and cases there collected). We should think, therefore, that if a creditor wilfully destroyed securities a fortiori the surety would be pro tanto discharged; and that such facts would, if properly stated in an equitable plea, be a good defence to an action like Abrey v. Cruz.

It is clear also that there was no great hardship in fact in Abrey v. Cruz. The defendant, the surety, on paying the amount of the bill, would become entitled to the securities in the plaintiff's hands, and his plea admitted that he only had a defence to the action to the extent of the value of those securities. It seems, therefore, that there is no peculiar hardship in cases like Abrey v. Cruz, and that there is no reason why the rules of evidence, which are salutary in other cases, should be relaxed in these; and we, therefore, think that the decision in fact given is more satisfactory than one in accordance with the views expressed by Willes, J., would have been.

MEASURE OF DAMAGES—PERSONAL INJURIES—FUTURE PROSPECTS.

Fair v. The London and North Western Railway Company, Q.B., 18 W. R. 66.

A singular attempt was made in this case to establish some rule whereby the liability of railway companies to compensate for personal injuries caused by their negligence might be subjected to some limit as to the amount of compensation payable.

The plaintiff had been injured in an accident on the defendants' line and recovered £5,000 damages. In awarding this sum the jury took into consideration the probable damage to his future prospects by the injuries he had suffered. The defendants applied for a rule for a new trial or a reduction of damages, and it was argued with much force that a claim for damage to future prospects is of a very vague nature as such damage can only be ascertained by a sort of guess, and the hardship to railway companies, who do not and cannot know the amount of the liability they may be incurring on receiving a passenger, was much dwelt upon.

The Court refused even to grant a rule for the argument of the question, and they expressed an opinion that in this case, under the circumstances, £5,000 was "within reasonable limits." They also appear to have been of opinion that the rule that now exists by which such damages may be recovered is reasonable and expedient. There is no doubt but that the liability to heavy damages in these cases acts as a most salutary check upon the too prevalent carelessness of railway management, and this case shows that in the opinion of the learned judges of the Queen's Bench there is no reason why railway companies should be relieved from this liability.

CRIMINAL LAW.

PRACTICE—PROOF OF PREVIOUS CONVICTION—
OFFENCES RELATING TO THE COIN—24 & 25 VICT.
C. 99, ss. 12, 37.

Reg. v. Martin, C.C.R., 18 W. R. 72.

Section 12 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, provides that whoever shall be guilty of an offence relating to the coin after having been previously convicted of a similar offence shall be guilty of felony and liable to the punishment therein specified. By section 37 when any person shall have been convicted of any offence relating to the coin, and shall subsequently be indicted for any offence against this Act (which relates exclusively to coinage offences), the subsequent offence shall first be inquired into by the jury, and if they find the prisoner guilty then and not before the previous conviction is to be inquired into.

Although the wording of section 37 is sufficiently clear there is some technical difficulty in applying its provisions to cases falling under section 12, because section 12 creates a new felony constituted by the commission of a coinage offence (in itself a mere misdemeanour) after a conviction for a previous similar offence. A jury, therefore, would have to be asked on an indictment for a felony under section 12, whether a prisoner is guilty of a misdemeanour in committing the second offence, and then subsequently whether he is guilty of the felony created by section 12 in consequence of the previous conviction having been established after proof of the second offence.

Up to the present time there has been some doubt as to the practice which ought to be pursued on the trial of an indictment under section 12. That is to say it was doubted whether section 37 applied to such indictments. In Reg. v. Goodwin (10 Cox, C. C. 534) Mellor, J., ruled, following a previous ruling of Lush, J., that section 37 did not apply to trials on indictments under section 12. He said "in a composite offence such as this, made a felony by statute, the two questions cannot be separated as in the case of offences where the previous conviction only increases the punishment."

It is not easy to reconcile this ruling with the express words of section 37, and there has always been a doubt as to whether this is the true construction of the statute.

Reg. v. Martin has now settled this doubt. The Court for Crown Cases Reserved were unanimously of opinion that section 37 applied to indictments under section 12, and Lush, J., said, that his attention was not called to section 37 when he ruled that the previous conviction could be proved before the jury had found their verdict as to the subsequent offence. This decision may possibly cause some technical anomaly, but it is clearly in accordance with the wording of section 37, and also with the dictates of practical common sense.

REVIEWS.

The Statutes of Henry VII. In exact fac simile from the very rare original printed by Caxton in 1489. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by JOHN RAE, M.R.I. London: Hotten.

The contrast between the Parliamentary procedure of the present day and the Parliamentary procedure of what are called the Middle Ages is a fair sample of changes which have taken place in ways of life, of thought, and in society generally. How great the difference between a modern Act of scores or even hundreds of sections, creeping with all its minuteness of detail across the intricacies of the existing law, and the short terse statute of Richard III. or Henry VII. Now-a-days, in a highly artificial and complex manner of life, the Legislature is expected to provide for the mode in which its will is to be observed, down to minute items of detail, whereby Act succeeding, partially repealing or reviving Act, sometimes causes immoderate confusion. Four or five hundred years ago it was sufficient if the Legislature declared broadly what the law was to be, and left the details of carrying it into effect to the executive. Having forbidden such or such an action, it was sufficient to enact that those who disobeyed should be "punished at the King's pleasure" or "grievously amerced." Every one knew well enough the meaning of these bold, broad mandates, and it was left to the Crown and its representatives to provide for the minutiae in some more or less rough-and-ready fashion. Doubtless this amplitude, being also incertitude, left open a door for oppression and injustice, but it was free from some of the disadvantages of the modern system; and it is probably not far from the truth to say that an honest will in the executive could always administer a mediæval statute so as to carry out its intention fairly and justly, while the same is not true of every modern one.

Equally significant is the difference between the modern progress of a bill through Parliament, with first, second, and third readings, its committal, re-committal, committal pro forma, report of amendments, &c., and the old manner in which statutes were manufactured, at first by a simple debate on the frame of a law, then by an enactment made by the Crown in answer to a petition of the Commons. The introduction of a draft enactment in the form of the modern bill did not take place till the close of the reign of Henry VI. Occasionally, complaints were made that the enactments contained matter foreign and repugnant to the Commons' petitions; at another time there was a remonstrance made, that some ordinances had been enrolled as laws to which the assent of Parliament had never been given.

Mr. Rae has presented the world with a fac simile of Caxton's print of the statutes of Henry VII.; and, as Mr. Rae observes, since Henry's third Parliament met in 1489, Caxton dying in 1491 or 1492, this must have been one of the last works of the father of English printing. Mr. Blades, in his "Life and Typography of Caxton," says that four perfect copies of this work are known to be in existence—viz., one in the Inner Temple Library, one Earl Spencer's, one in the Grenville collection, now in the British Museum (of which the present copy is the fac simile), and one in the Imperial Library at Paris. Mr. Rae, however, states that he has ascertained that there is not and never has been any such copy at Paris. He states, also, that Dr. Dibdin wrote an account of this Grenville Caxton in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1811, and a reference is given to page 232. The Gentleman's Magazine of 1811 consists of two parts, paged separately. In neither part does page 232 contain any communication from Dr. Dibdin on this Caxton; but at page 332 of part I. is a letter from Dr. Dibdin, in which he mentions the discovery by him of the Spencer copy. Whether or not Dr. Dibdin ever knew of the Grenville Caxton (he certainly had never heard of it when he wrote this letter), he makes no mention of it either in his "Bibliomania" (1811), or in his "Tour" (1817), or "Bibliographical Decameron" (1821).

The statutes of any given reign are often an important part of its history, always an important part of the materials for its history. The preambles alone of the statutes of Henry VII. are highly significant to any one who has traced with Mr. Froude, or some other able historian, the causes which led to the great moral revolution of the next reign. We need only instance, in proof of this, the statute De Finibus, and another of which, perhaps, even more might be said, the statute which aimed at preventing the "decay of husbandry" by forbidding the throwing up of homesteads, the conversion of tillage into pasture land, and the keeping of large farms in hand. An interesting volumemight be written on the condition of the country which led to the passing of this latter Act, comprising in its scope the reign of Henry VII. and continued down to the abortive commission set on foot by Somerset, the Protector, under Edward VI. Some such thought as this, indeed, is put forth by Mr. Rae as his apology for the present fac simile, though, if this were all, Pickering's edition would probably be found much more serviceable than that of Caxton. But, in truth, no apology is needed. We cannot all possess an original Caxton, and ought to be obliged to any one who places a good fac simile within our reach. Prefixed to the Caxton is a short introductory account of the legislation embodied in these statutes. There is also a glossary of hard phrases and words, with annotations and explanations, which will enable the average reader to apprehend the import of passages which would otherwise puzzle him.

The introductions and annotations are not indeed, so well compiled and written as the fac simile is well executed; the fac simile has been remarkably well done, but the editorial part of the work is rather slipshod, and somewhat popular and shallow in its learning. Still, however, Mr. Rae is to be thanked for producing a work which will be very appropriate to a lawyer's drawing-room table.

Digest of and Index to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; the Debtors Act, 1869; and the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869. By JOHN LINKLATER, Solicitor. London: Butterworths. 1870.

This little work is exactly what its name expresses. It is simply an index to the new Act. Even the Acts themselves are not reprinted, which, seeing that they are already in everybody's hands, is probably rather an advantage than otherwise.

The index is very full and accurate, the most so that we have yet seen. It is also admirably printed in clear type and on good paper, no small advantage in an index.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1869; The Debtors Act, 1869; The Insolvent Debtors and Bankruptcy Repeal Act, 1869, together with The General Rules and Orders in Bankruptcy, at Common Law, and in the County Courts; with notes, references, and a very copious index. By HENRY PHILIP ROCHE, Esq., and WILLIAM HAZLITT, Esq., Barristers-at-Law, Registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy. London: Stevens & Haynes. 1870.

To those who wish to have a copy of the new Acts, and of the Rules and Forms, under one cover, and in a convenient form, together with an index, we can recommend this book. There are a few notes to various sections of the Acts, and some of them point out concisely the difference between the new law and the old, and contain references to recent cases. But they are not very systematic. And with the exception of these the only thing in the book which is the work of the editors is the index. They have not had time even to give references from the sections of the Acts to the Rules and Forms by means of which they are to be worked. The index, however, is very good.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S INN.

Jan. 22.—Re Heritage and Heritage.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 194—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 13, rule 260.

On the 30th of December last the debtors Messrs. Heritage & Heritage, who were cheesemongers and grocers, executed an assignment of the whole of their property for the benefit of their creditors. The trustees took possession, and, for the purpose of selling the business with the goodwill, they kept the shop open. The debtors were unable to obtain a sufficient number of assents to the deed under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, but it appeared that registration had taken place under the 194th section of that statute. After the date of the assignment, viz., the 14th January, 1870, a petition for adjudication was presented by a creditor, and on the same day the Court made an order under the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the 260th rule, appointing a receiver. Immediately upon his appointment the receiver proceeded to the shop of the debtors, turned the man acting under the assignment out of the premises, and took possession of everything.

Reed, for the trustees under the deed, now moved for a rule calling on the receiver to show cause why he should not withdraw from possession. He submitted that the receiver was appointed under the statute for the protection of property belonging to the debtor, and that he had no authority to invade the rights of other persons. For the purpose of demonstrating the fact that the trustees possessed a good title, he referred to Symons v. George, 34 L. J. Ex. 187.

The Court granted a rule nisi.

Re Latham.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, rule 260.

Under this petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition, the following notice of motion had been given:—

"The Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

"In the London Bankruptcy Court.

"In the matter of proceedings for liquidation by arrangement or composition instituted by Richard Collins Latham, of 32, High-street, Peckham, in the county of Surrey, grocer.

"Take notice, that this Honourable Court will be moved on behalf of the debtor, on Saturday next, the 22nd day of January inst., that the further proceedings in the several actions brought by you against him may be restrained until the further order of this Honourable Court.

"Yours, &c.,

"JAMES MOTE,

"1, Walbrook,

"Attorney for the said debtor.

"To Messrs." [then follow the names of the several plaintiffs].

Mr. Mote (solicitor), in support of the motion, stated that on the 14th inst. the petition for liquidation was presented, and on the same day the Court appointed a receiver.

Brough, for one of the plaintiffs, stated that the fact of his having obtained judgment and levied execution on the effects of the debtor did not appear on the affidavits. The notice was altogether informal, for it did not state where or at what hour the motion would be made. The sheriff took possession without interference, and it did not appear that the receiver had given notice of his appointment to either of the plaintiffs.

Mr. Piesse (solicitor), for another of the plaintiffs, asked that provision should be made for his costs.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the object of the appointment of a receiver was to prevent one set of creditors obtaining an undue advantage over the others; and he could hardly understand how the sheriff had been allowed to make a levy. There would be an order restraining further proceedings; but at present no direction would be given to the sheriff to withdraw. The costs of the plaintiffs must be reserved. His Lordship added that the notice of motion appeared to be informal.

Jan. 25.—Nixon and Another v. Rigg.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7.

This was the first debtor's summons under the new law. It had been adjourned in order that the defendant might find security for the balance of the plaintiffs' claim, and bondsmen had been proposed but the registrar had rejected them.

R. Griffiths, for the debtor, asked for further time to file the necessary bond.

Bagley, for the creditor, objected to further delay.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the object of the order was to secure the amount of the debt and costs. The defendant would be allowed to continue his defence, but only on the terms that he found security. The time would be enlarged until Friday next.

Re D. Tidey.

Rule 260.

Reed moved for an order restraining further proceedings in an action brought against the bankrupt. He stated that the adjudication took place on the 21st of January, and it was very important, in the interest of creditors, that the stock-in-trade should not be sacrificed. The bankrupt had carried on the business of a builder and the sheriff had given notice of sale.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the affidavits did not show that the sale would be injurious.

Reed said it would be utter destruction to the estate.

His LORDSHIP made an order, subject to the production of an additional affidavit, restraining the plaintiff from taking further proceedings on his judgment.

Solicitor, Reed.

Jan. 26.—Re Morgan.

In this case (mentioned ante, 252) Mr. Jones, solicitor, moved for and obtained an injunction restraining further proceedings in an action pending against the debtor at the period of the presentation by him of a petition for liquidation by arrangement.

Solicitors, Kent & Jones.

In re Bernadat.

Rules 178, 179.

Brough, for the trustee under this bankruptcy, moved for a rule nisi calling on a person who held a bill of sale over a portion of the bankrupt's effects to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt. It appeared that Bernadat was adjudicated a bankrupt under the new law on the 12th of January, and the bill of sale holder immediately upon becoming aware of the fact, sent a number of men to the bankrupt's premises, and they forcibly took possession. The affidavits showed that on the 16th inst. about seventeen persons were in possession, and that yesterday, after the application of a trustee, removal of the property commenced.

Mr. Loxley (solicitor) for the petitioning creditor.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that if the affidavits were correct a most violent contempt of court had been committed. Leave would be given to appoint a day, under the 178th & 179th rules, for the application to be made, and an injunction would now be granted restraining the bill of sale holder, his workmen, and agents from further interference with the bankrupt's property.

Solicitors, Ashurst, Morris, & Co.

Jan. 26.—Re Heritage and Heritage.

Rule to show cause—Practice—Rule 50.

In this case a rule had been granted calling upon the petitioning creditor and manager of the estate, to show cause why they should not withdraw from possession, and why the proceedings under the adjudication should not be stayed. The rule had been obtained on Saturday last, at the instance of the trustees, under a deed of assignment executed by the debtors, and leave had been given to make the rule returnable this morning.

Bagley, for the petitioning creditor and manager, stated that the rule was not served until Monday, the 24th, between the hours of two and three, and was not accompanied by any affidavit. On the same day, Messrs. Carter and Bell wrote to the solicitor for the debtor, a letter requiring a copy of the affidavit, but no affidavit was sent until a few minutes before four o'clock yesterday, and to answer it was impossible. Referring to the 50th of the new rules, he contended that the proceedings were irregular.

Reed, for the trustees, said the facts relied upon were within the knowledge of the other side, and the Court had given leave to make the rule returnable to-day.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—Why was not the rule served on Saturday?

Reed.—The rule was taken to the registrar, and not settled by him until Monday.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—You obtain a rule on Saturday and do not serve it until Monday afternoon, and you do not serve the affidavit until Tuesday. That is not fair.

Reed said the property was being ruined.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—I would rather not refer to the merits of the case. The question is whether the other side should have time. I think they are entitled to further time.

The proceedings accordingly stood adjudged until Monday.

Solicitors, Carter & Bell; Ditton.

NEW ORDER.

By an order recently issued the Chief Judge has delegated to the several registrars of his court the several powers hereunder specified, that is to say,—

1. The power to hear and determine any debtor's summons and any application to dismiss such summons, and to make all such orders as may be requisite relating thereto.

2. The power to hear and to adjudicate upon all bankruptcy petitions, and to determine all matters in relation thereto, except the power to restrain or regulate proceedings under section 13 of the Act.

3. To adjudicate upon any application by the trustee in relation to directions given to him by the committee of inspection.

4. To adjudicate upon any application to annul the order of adjudication under section 28.

5. To adjudicate upon any application for close of the bankruptcy under section 47.

6. To grant orders and issue requests for auxiliary aid under section 74.

7. To grant orders for the examination of persons in Scotland or Ireland under section 75.

8. To issue warrants for the discovery of property under section 76.

9. To adjudicate as to the consolidation and transfer of proceedings, the substitution of a creditor for the petitioning creditor, and the continuance of proceedings notwithstanding the death of the bankrupt under section 80.

10. To order the re-direction and delivery of post letters addressed to the bankrupt upon the application of the trustee, under section 85 of the Act.

11. To issue subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses or of the bankrupt or his wife, and for the production of documents under section 96, and to take the examination of such parties under section 97.

12. To adjudicate as to the payment of debts admitted to be due to the estate under section 98.

13. To grant search warrants for the discovery of property under section 99.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. WILLIAM WEEDON, solicitor, of Reading, has been elected Coroner for the Eastern Division of the County of Berks, in succession to the late Mr. Rupert Clarke. Mr. Weedon was certificated an attorney in Michaelmas Term, 1851, and formerly practised in the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors. For the last twelve years he has been Deputy-Coroner under the late Mr. Clarke.

Mr. JOHN MOLESWORTH, solicitor, of Rochdale, has been elected one of the County Coroners for Lancashire, in the room of the late Mr. Thomas Ferrand Dearden. Mr. Molesworth, whose certificate as an attorney dates from Michaelmas Term, 1840, is a member of the Rochdale firm of Molesworth & March, and is the local solicitor to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

Mr. BRAHAZON CAMPBELL, solicitor, of Warwick, has been appointed Registrar of Warwick County Court, in succession to the late Mr. F. Tibbits. Mr. Campbell was a short while ago appointed Clerk to the magistrates of the Warwick Petty Sessional Division, in the room of Mr. Tibbits, and has now succeeded to the other appointment left vacant by the death of that gentleman.

Mr. JOHN ELLIOTT FOX, solicitor, of 65, Chancery-lane, has been appointed Solicitor to the Customs Fund. Mr. Fox took out his certificate in Easter Term, 1851, and is a Commissioner in the Equity and Common Law Courts, and also in the Stannaries Court of Cornwall and Devon. He is a member of the Incorporated Law Society and of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association.

Mr. GEORGE MANDER, solicitor, of Wakefield, Yorkshire, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery in England.

Mr. C. C. MACRAE, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Clerk of the Crown in the High Court of Calcutta, in place of Mr. W. Theobald, barrister-at-law, who has resigned. Mr. Macrae has liberty to practise as an advocate while holding the office of Clerk to the Crown.

Mr. ADAM GIFFORD, Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland, has been appointed a Judge of the Court of Session in Scotland. Mr. Gifford was admitted a member of the Scotch Faculty of Advocates in 1849, in the same year as Mr. A. Rutherford Clark, the present Solicitor-General for Scotland. He has for several years past been Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland.

THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—In my last letter I drew attention to several serious evils which, regarding the matter theoretically, I considered it likely would result from the legislation of 1867 conferring judicial functions on the registrars of county courts. I now again advert to the subject for the purpose of pointing out that already, in practice, abuses have cropped up in connection with the new law, to which a stop should undoubtedly be put without delay. In one important court the registrar, as I am informed, is in the habit of issuing from 300 to 400 summonses for a single sitting, and it is not an unusual event to hear one of his clerks boast that a list containing upwards of 300 complaints has been “polished off” before three o'clock in the afternoon. Now, as the court is not open till ten in the morning, and as at least half of the complaints entered terminate in a judgment, it follows from the simplest arithmetical calculation that the hearing of each cause, including the official entry of the result, must, on an average, occupy a shorter period than two minutes. Literally and prosaically—thanks to the energy of the registrar—the suitor experiences the envied fate of the warrior:—“Concurruntur: hora momento cita mors venit aut victoria laeta.” I leave it to the Judicature Commissioners and to the public to determine whether this almost electric speed in the administration of justice is quite compatible with the calm investigation of truth.

In another large court a form of summons has been sanctioned, either by the judge or by the registrar, which certainly gives to the defendants some startling intelligence. In addition to the directions which all summonses are by law required to furnish, those in question contain the following notice, which, probably with the view of attracting especial attention to its contents, is printed in red ink:—“N.B.—All the causes will be called first before the registrar, at a quarter past ten o'clock a.m., and if defendants do not then answer to their names judgment may forthwith be obtained by plaintiff.” It would be a curious subject of speculation to inquire for what purpose, and under what circumstances, this strange announcement has been made. Does the registrar really act up to his notice, believing that he is authorised to pronounce judgment in all causes in which the defendants do not appear, oblivious of the fact that the statute has strictly limited his power “to any action founded on contract?” or does he—knowing what the law is, and not intending to violate it—imagine that the notice is in accordance with the law? or, lastly, is he anxious, like a zealous Catholic, to “do a little evil that good may come of it,” and consequently to give a wholesome warning to defendants, though it be purposely expressed in language which courtesy would describe as unhappily inexact? We may form a tolerable idea of what is meant by judgment being “forthwith obtained” if we pray in aid the practice of the first-mentioned court, where a list of 300 causes is run through in 300 minutes, but it may be worth asking whether the registrar, who is responsible for the notice, is aware that he can only, under the Act in question, enter up judgment in any case “upon due proof of the debt being owing.”

Without pressing this topic further, and simply using the instances cited as fair examples of the mode in which the statute is being interpreted, I contend that the practical effect of the new law has been to introduce into the county courts a sort of spurious judgment by default; and this, too, although the system is not protected, as in the superior courts, by that which alone renders it tolerable—the necessity of personal service. Allow summonses to be left, as they are under the county court practice, at the houses of the defendants, and judgment by default becomes a gross violation of justice. As a rule applicable in all cases of non-personal service, I find it more necessary to sift the plaintiff's claim when the defendant is absent than when he is present. In the latter event the defendant can fight his own battle; in the former, his interests, if justice is to be done, must be protected by the court.

But, apart from the above observations, which illustrate and condemn the abuses of the new law, and which indirectly reflect upon the law itself as being one which is calculated to foster such abuses, let us now consider the plan, assuming that it is being worked in the most conscientious and upright manner. Seen in this unwelcome light, it is still open to two grave objections that have not yet been mentioned. The one is, that, whenever the judge and the registrar sit concurrently as two separate courts, the former is deprived of the services of the latter in several important matters, and is forced to rest satisfied with the insufficient aid of a mere clerk. Under the old system it was the duty of the registrar, on a court day, to enter up the judgments as they were pronounced by the judge, and such entry became the official record of the proceedings. This, in fact, was the most responsible task performed by the registrar, and it was obviously one which ought never to have been entrusted to an inferior officer. Again, the assistance of the registrar is often required by the judge in referring to a rule of practice, or in finding a particular enactment in a statute, or in hunting for a case in a digest, or in marking a passage in a text-book. Services such as these can only be efficiently performed by an educated lawyer, and a clerk, however zealous he may be, is of no real use. No doubt the judge can make the necessary searches for himself, but these will often cause delay and embarrassment at the trial, and will occasionally lead to an inconvenient adjournment.

The remaining objection to the new law is that it almost necessitates the attendance of all the suitors at the opening of the court. The summonses, therefore, must be uniformly returnable for the same hour, and in every contested cause the parties are put to the double inconvenience, first of going before the registrar at ten in the morning to state that the claim is not admitted, and next, of going before the judge, perhaps late in the afternoon, to try the question in dispute. The value of an entire day's work is thus constantly lost to the poorer litigants, who can ill afford such loss; and this is not all; for, wearied out by vexatious waiting, the parties are only too apt to while away the interval between the mock trial and the real one at any neighbouring public-house, and consequently, when the cause comes on for trial, they are often, to use the policeman's formula, “in liquor, your Honour,” and with empty pockets and hot heads they are ripe for any unseemly altercation.

To illustrate the full force of this last objection I will refer to the practice established in my own court. There 100 complaints are issued for each day, fifty of which are fixed for ten o'clock, thirty for noon, and twenty for two o'clock. When the list contains many tally cases or other small debts claimed by retail tradesmen the clerks are authorised to issue ten or twenty more complaints, which are distributed, like the others, over the three periods of the day. Causes sent down from the superior courts, jury causes, heavy adjournments, and interpleaders are generally set down for three o'clock, and at the special instance of counsel or attorneys other cases, which are likely to occupy time, are appointed for particular hours, often late in the afternoon. The court sits, on an average, about seven hours a-day; and it is a rare event when any suitor is exposed to an inconvenient detention. When the debts are admitted, and the parties or their agents sign a paper containing the terms of payment, the causes are taken out of their turn, and the litigants are at once released; but otherwise each plaintiff comes on for hearing in the order in which it is entered, and, except as stated above, no attempt is made to separate the contentions from the non-contentious business. After what I have written I need scarcely state that, as the law empowers me to adopt or reject sections 16 & 17 of the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, these enactments are in my court regarded as "dead letters." The system here sketched out has been in full operation for the last fifteen years, and I know that it gives very great satisfaction to the suitors. Occasionally, when there has been an unusual run of admitted or simple cases, I have got through my ten o'clock list before twelve, or my twelve o'clock list before two. But in that event relaxation for a few minutes is felt by me as no hardship, and I have the satisfaction of perceiving the practical advantages of the plan. On several occasions, at a quarter before twelve, I have caused the twelve o'clock list to be called over, and not a party has answered on either side, but at five minutes after twelve the causes have been called on again, and the parties on both sides have been in punctual attendance.

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

UNQUALIFIED PRACTITIONERS.

Sir,—I have frequently seen in your useful publication letters complaining of the interference by "agents" (as they call themselves) and such like, with professional rights in the metropolitan county courts. But I believe the mischief referred to is of secondary importance compared with that in the country, arising from unqualified persons undertaking business of various kinds properly belonging to solicitors. I believe there is an impression abroad that genuine law is too costly, and, therefore, the spurious article is often preferred. Frequent instances have occurred within my knowledge of disastrous consequences from employing non-professional persons. Often, for instance, the clergyman, meaning well but incompetent, the village schoolmaster, or others supposed to be fully equal to the task, and willing for five shillings or less to perform it, are in the habit of preparing wills involving property sometimes of a large amount, and requiring special clauses to carry out the intentions of the testator. Besides these innovators the profession have to compete with land surveyors, who, besides receiving the rents of large estates at a handsome commission (formerly enjoyed by us) prepare leases and agreements for leases, notices to quit, &c., and charge for so doing almost in the same terms as solicitors; auctioneers who prepare conditions of sale, &c., and last, but not least, quondam lawyers' clerks, who transact all kinds of legal business cheap. As a specimen of the latter I enclose the copy of a bill sent in by a person who was for a short time articled gratis, and afterwards was a writer in an office, who now calls himself a "solicitor's accountant," and recently pocketed several pounds for initiating proceedings in bankruptcy; and I shall be glad to know whether certain of the items in it are not worthy of the attention of the Law Society.

ATTORNEYS AND BARRISTERS.

Sir,—In my two previous letters to you I never intended to treat the question as one of rivalry between the two branches of the profession inter se, as your correspondent

A. E. M. redundantly expresses himself. It is undoubtedly one of greater or less public advantage, but I am at a loss to discern the logic of a gentleman who after putting it on this broad ground talks about the junior bar being deprived of many thousands of pounds. If the present system exists merely for the purpose of remunerating a certain class, "public advantage" demands at once that it be abolished. I am sure Mr. Field and the gentlemen who think with him, would by no means object to barristers acting as solicitors. A. E. M. seems to consider the rule of law which prevents a barrister from suing a defaulting client for his fees, and the etiquette of the profession which prevents him from dealing with the ultimate client direct, to be advantages. I venture to say that they are not only not advantages, but are absolutely pernicious. Many young barristers have often lamented to me the hardship of their case, and complained that they are ruled by men who are in a position to be able to forego their fees if the debtor refuses to pay. They argue that there is no reason whatever for making a difference in this respect between them and attorneys. I earnestly implore A. E. M. to re-peruse Mr. Saunders' paper upon this, and the great advantage of dealing with the client direct. I have myself seen the advantage of this in France and Belgium.

Unless the arguments in favour of the existing system from such correspondents as A. E. M. be sounder, I am afraid it will stand a poor chance against the present movement. Already an association has been formed for the purpose of carrying out the amalgamation, a proof of whose prospectus was put into my hands this morning and which I beg to enclose.

At York, last October, Mr. Lawrance, the President of the Incorporated Law Society,* when presiding and speaking of the Bankruptcy Act, congratulated the profession on their being admitted to plead before a judge who ranked as one of her Majesty's judges at Westminster, and before a special jury, and stated he should be one of the first to avail himself of the change. He also said that the complete fusion could not be above four or five years distant.

I feel confident that if the association fairly push its efforts it will be impossible to stem the torrent of public opinion against what I believe to be one of the greatest abuses of modern times.

A SOLICITOR.

London, Jan. 19, 1870.

A FAIR RING AND NO FAVOUR.

Sir,—I rejoice to see that a correspondence has been raised in your columns on the suggested fusion of the two branches of the profession, and I hope you will allow a continuation thereof, and so secure a thorough ventilation of the question.

It is a matter, however, for regret that those who would uphold the status quo are so scantily represented.

Your correspondent, A. E. M., from Lincoln's-inn, is the only one who has yet been induced to contribute a word on that side, and he confessedly avoids the "real question," whether the proposed alteration will be for the benefit of suitors. He attempts to impress solicitors with the fear that direct competition on the part of the "junior bar" will result in a pecuniary loss to the "other" branch of the profession.

The heading to my former letter, which I again adopt, will clear me from a suspicion of any such fear. The regulations to which A. E. M. alludes as restrictions upon the bar ought doubtless to be removed. It is only common sense that every adviser should have direct personal communication with the person seeking advice, and it is only common justice that a labourer of any kind should have a right to enforce payment of money fairly earned. It is the existence of an etiquette to the contrary of this, and which comprises other rules, equally opposed to common sense and common justice, that is complained of, and it is difficult to conceive that they were originally framed from purely patriotic and unselfish motives.

A very simple reason for the practice of avoiding personal communication direct with the client may be found in the fact that it is more convenient, a great saving of time, and more profitable to those at the head of the profession (who would naturally be the authors of the rule) to have the chief labour done and all the tiresome details collected for them by other hands. Pride of caste rebelled against the idea that any of their own order should do the jackal's work, hence the hard and fast line—aut Caesar aut nullus—which has operated, as I believe, greatly to diminish the number of Caesars. The honorarium principle is probably less a piece of pride than rapacity on the part of the leading members of the governing body, for, from their own great eminence and repute they know their services to be indispensable and their position secure, and they can both impose their own terms as to the amount of fee and afford to refuse a brief without pre-payment. The rule works harshly only upon their younger brethren who are compelled to give credit for their honoraria, and leave themselves at the mercy of their employers.

The junior bar have grounds in common with attorneys for urging a reform, and I hope sincerely they will more generally consider the matter and aid in bringing one about. The obstacles are enormous, I am aware, almost appalling; especially, as I believe, even among attorneys themselves, a large number, probably a majority, if polled and balloted, would vote against the change. From old associations, most of the senior practitioners who have been successful in their calling and acquired wealth and earned repute under the present system, will be disinclined to favour any alteration; and there are other reasons for the vis inertiae, which one of your correspondents deploras, in the profession itself—namely, that there are many amongst the most influential who will stand to gain nothing by a change, and many who are too timid to bear the responsibility.

There is a phase on the point of responsibility which, as it probably had a share in bringing about the prohibition under which attorneys suffer, and, as it is, I think, at the same time, a cardinal argument against it, I would ask leave to expose.

In consequence of the secluded atmosphere in which a barrister moves, and his non-contact with the unhappy suitor, there is a sort of involuntary temptation to, rather than a restraint upon, recklessness in advising litigation; and the attorney also is possibly, sometimes more a fosterer of disputes than a healer of differences, from the consciousness that if the suit instituted should be unsuccessful, he will have the opportunity, in explanation to his client, of throwing the chief responsibility upon the counsel in the case, but for whose mismanagement, not reading their briefs, &c., the result would have been different. The client cannot get at the counsel, who are out of the arena, to upbraid them, and they are consequently comparatively indifferent and have no need to retort upon the attorney as they would often have just ground for doing. The proposed alteration would impose a more direct feeling of responsibility among the actors in the scene, to, as I submit, the advantage of the general public.

OBITUARY.

RIGHT HON. EDWARD LITTON.

We have to record the death of the Right Hon. Edward Litton, a master of the Irish Court of Chancery, who expired at Dublin on the 22nd of January, at the venerable age of eighty-two years. He was the son of Edward Litton, Esq., of Ballyfarmoth, co. Dublin (a gentleman of ancient family and good property, who served as an officer in the British army during the American war of independence), by Charlotte, daughter of the Very Rev. Daniel Letablaré, Dean of Tuam. He was born at Glasnevin, co. Dublin, on the 1st December, 1787, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated M.A., and gained five medals from the Historical Society of that University. He was called to the Irish Bar in Easter Term, 1811, and became a Queen's Counsel in 1834. Previous to entering Parliament he took a distinguished part in the Belfast and Tyrone Conservative meetings in 1836, and at the great Protestant meeting in Dublin, in January, 1837. Mr. Litton represented Coleraine in the Conservative interest, from 1837 to 1842, when he was appointed, during Sir Robert Peel's administration, a master of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, being at the time of his death the senior master. In 1868 he became a member of the Privy Council of Ireland. He married in September, 1813, Sophia, eldest daughter of the Rev. Henry Stewart, D.D., rector of Loughgilly, co. Armagh, and niece of the late Right Hon. Sir John Stewart, Bart., who was Attorney-General for Ireland in 1799. Two of his sons are members of the Irish Bar, and one is an examiner in the Irish Court of Chancery. Mr. Litton's genial kind heartedness was proverbial, and he was universally popular both with the Bar and the public. The funeral, which took place on the 27th instant, was attended by the Council of the Society of Attorneys and Solicitors of Ireland, in their representative capacity.

MR. C. T. ELSERS.

The death of Mr. Carew T. Elers, barrister-at-law, of the Midland Circuit, took place on the 12th January, at Saltford, his residence, near Warwick. Mr. Elers was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in January, 1852, and was the leader of the Bar at the Birmingham Quarter Sessions; he also practised at the Warwick and Coventry sessions, and some years ago at the Central Criminal Court.

MR. JOHN HODGSON.

We have to record the death of Mr. John Hodgson, solicitor, of Arbour-square, Stepney, who expired on the 19th of January, at the advanced age of eighty-one years. Mr. Hodgson was admitted to practise as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1816. The late Lord Brougham was indebted for his first brief to Mr. Hodgson, who was also the first to recognise the ability of Mr. Tindal, afterwards Lord Chief Justice. The Daily Telegraph states that Mr. Hodgson was able to boast that he had given briefs to every common law judge and every equity judge on the Bench. The deceased gentleman, who was a native of Cumberland, practised for the last thirty years in the Thames Police Court, where his extensive knowledge of maritime law secured him a large business.

MR. R. ROOPE.

The recordership of Tiverton has become vacant by the death of Mr. Richard Roope, barrister-at-law, of the Western Circuit, which took place at Stockland, Somerset, after a short illness, on the 20th January. Mr. Roope was educated at King's College, London, of which body he was admitted an associate in 1839, in the department of General Literature and Science. He afterwards proceeded to Wadham College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1842, and M.A. in 1845. In June of the latter year he was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple, and was appointed recorder of Tiverton in June, 1866, in succession to Mr. John Tyrrell. Mr. Roope was in his fiftieth year.

MR. JOHN THRUPP.

The death of Mr. John Thrupp, a London solicitor, took place at Dorking on the 20th January, in the fifty-third year of his age. The deceased gentleman was the eldest son of the late Mr. John Thrupp, of Spanish-place and Oxford-street, and began to practise as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1838. He was for many years located at Great Winchester-street, City, but had latterly carried on business at Doctors' Commons. For some years past he had been in partnership with Mr. Robert Dixon, under the style of Thrupp & Dixon.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society held on the 25th inst. the following question was discussed:—"Should the principles of free trade be adopted without reference to reciprocity?" Mr. Hepburn was in the chair, and the question was opened by Mr. Addison in the affirmative, who was followed by seven other speakers, mostly on the same side. The question was ultimately decided in the affirmative by a majority of sixteen to four. The number of members present at the meeting was thirty-four.

Of the sixty-six members of the Senate of the United States more than two-thirds (or forty-six) are lawyers.

The solicitors practising in the Newcastle County Court, following the example of Mr. Mortimer, the new registrar, are about to adopt the practice of wearing gowns while carrying on their professional duties. The judge, who said he felt inclined to make an order on the subject, left the matter to the decision of the solicitors themselves.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER ON THE RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF MARRIED WOMEN.

At a meeting of the Juridical Society, held on Wednesday evening, Mr. H. R. Droop read a paper on the "Property Rights of Married Women." Its purport was to advocate some further alteration of the law, with a view to giving married women greater control over their property. After the paper had been read, Sir Roundell Palmer, who is the president of the Society, rose to make some observations on the subject. He did not intend, he said, so much to enter into the discussion of any particular projects or measures, as to invite attention to some general principles and broad considerations which he thought should govern it. The subject might be considered, he said, with reference to the interests of women (that is, not only married women, but the sex generally, as most women expected to be married, and all, therefore, had a common interest in the subject), the interests of families, and the interests of society. And, again, it might be considered either with reference to the richer or the upper classes, or to the poorer and humbler classes of society; and no measure of legislation would be beneficial which dealt out the same abstract rule of law, without discrimination, to all. Now, first, in this threefold point of view, what was the general tendency and character of the law as it stood with reference to married women—did it or did it not tend to and favour their protection? He thought that it did. They were not liable for their husbands' debts or contracts, and could not be sued for them; while, on the other hand, their husbands were to a great extent, within the limits of a reasonable or necessary agency, liable on the contracts of their wives. No doubt, the husband had a certain control over his wife's property; but that was subject, in its turn, to the control of courts of equity, who in fitting cases acted on what was called the "equity" of the wife for a settlement, and compelled the husband to make a proper settlement out of her property. This, no doubt, only applied to the better classes of society, as to whom, probably, the matter would usually be adjusted by settlements, and this class of cases included, of course, most of those in which any considerable property was involved. As regarded other and humbler classes, other considerations, however, applied. But there was one great consideration which applied to all, and that was, what would be the tendency of legislation based upon the principle of making wives independent of their husbands? Would it be conducive to domestic peace and the harmony of families? He entertained grave doubts upon that question; doubts increased by cases he had observed in the course of his experience. Separation deeds were not unknown, and they led sometimes to strange complications. He remembered a case in which under some separation deed the husband and wife were to live in the same house, with separate rights of property, the wife being bound to furnish a table and a certain income to her husband, and more than one suit in equity sprung from the miserable and petty disputes which arose between them. He feared lest legislation in the spirit he supposed might lead to frequent chancery suits—not at all a good thing for society or for families. He had heard the Master of the Rolls say that the most effectual means of securing to a married woman control over her property was to give it to her separate use, provided there was a restraint on the power of anticipation. Hence the provision in settlements against power of anticipation, and it might be open to consideration whether there might not be more control allowed to married women over their incomes. But he deprecated legislation conceived in a spirit which would tend to make women unfeminine. And, again, if women were to have the control of their own property, and their husbands were to be liable for their debts, it might be thought necessary that married women should be liable on their contracts. Would that be a good thing? Would it be well that the mother of the family should be liable to be withdrawn from it by arrest for debt, or harrassed by suits at law upon her contracts? Arrest for debt, it might be said, was abolished; but it was not so as to the humbler classes, for it had been thought necessary to retain it as to debtors in county courts. This aspect of the case was very important as to the poorer classes. As regarded those classes, no doubt, it might be desirable that when the husband did not do his duty by his wife she should have a more easy and summary mode of obtaining protection, and to that extent there might be a fair case for legislation, as there might also be with respect to the income of married women. To that extent he might recognise some benefit in legislation, but beyond that, at present, he was not prepared to go.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds commenced the week with some buoyancy, but have subsequently been rather dull. With the exception of some fluctuations in railways, all the markets have been very quiet. The immediate disbursement of £5,715,048, by the Government on account of the telegraph companies will probably raise prices, at any rate temporarily. The new Russian loan is being taken up with extreme avidity, but its competition does not seem to have at all interfered with the other markets.

All applications for certificates in the Nevada Freehold Properties Trust must be sent in not later than next Saturday, on which day the trustees close the list.

THE WORCESTER AND WORCESTERSHIRE LAW SOCIETY.—The annual general meeting of this society was held at Worcester on the 14th January, Mr. John Stallard, solicitor, president of the society, occupying the chair. From the report it appeared that the number of members is seventy-four, showing an increase of four over the year 1868; three of the new members are barristers, raising the number of barrister members to twenty. Mr. William Allen, solicitor, was elected president of the society for the ensuing year, still retaining the offices of honorary secretary and treasurer. Mr. Holyoake was elected vice-president; and Messrs. Hyde, Bedford, Hughes and Corbett were nominated members of the committee.

BREAKFAST.—EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—The very agreeable character of this preparation has rendered it a general favourite. The "Civil Service Gazette" remarks:—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavoured beverage which may save many heavy doctors' bills." Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in tin-lined packets, labelled—JAMES EPPS & Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.—ADVT.

LONDON, FEBRUARY, 5, 1870.

WE NOTICED LAST WEEK the case of Reg. v. Stainer, then pending in the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved. The question in the case was whether an officer of a friendly society, some of whose rules were in restraint of trade, was liable to be indicted for embezzling their funds. It was argued for the prisoner that the society was illegal in the sense of criminal, and, therefore, that its members could be indicted; and secondly, that even if not criminal, it was still so far illegal that the courts of law would not recognise its existence; and so the prisoner, not being recognised in law as their servant, could not be guilty of embezzlement. It was admitted in argument that if the society were for a criminal purpose the prosecution could not be sustained.

The Court last Saturday affirmed the conviction on the ground that, although the rules in restraint of trade might be illegal in the sense of not being capable of being enforced, yet there was nothing criminal in such rules, and that the society was entitled to the protection of the criminal law, notwithstanding that some of their rules might be void, as being contrary to public policy.

It is not necessary to point out the importance of this decision by which the funds of trades' unions and friendly societies whose rules are in restraint of trade are now declared to be within the protection of the criminal law. The scope of this decision, important as it is, may, however, be easily exaggerated. It must be remembered that the decision is strictly limited to the precise point at issue. The law respecting the civil consequences of rules in restraint of trade, the power of enforcing such rules, and the general effect of such rules upon civil proceedings are all left untouched by Reg. v. Stainer.

The principle of the cases of Hilton v. Eckersley (25 L. J. Q. B. 199), where it was held that no action could be maintained on a bond in restraint of trade, and of Hornby v. Close (15 W. R. 336), and Farrer v. Close (17 W. R. 1129) where friendly societies having rules in restraint of trade were held to be illegal societies under the Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63), are not affected by this decision. In these three cases the court carefully abstained from expressing an opinion as to whether the agreements there in question were or were not criminal. It is this question and this alone which Reg. v. Stainer has settled.

It is now clear that agreements or rules in restraint of trade are not criminal, and this decision is quite in accordance with the principle of the Trades Unions Funds Protection Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 61), of last session, which although it did not directly apply to such a case as Reg. v. Stainer was treated by the court as a conclusive in dictation of the intention of the legislature with respect to such cases.

THE FIRST PARAGRAPH of the letter of "A Metropolitan County Court Judge" in last week's Journal, is curiously illustrated by the statistical return of county court business for last year. According to these figures one court can "polish off," or as some of them call it,

"bustle through," at a sitting, nearly five times as many cases as another can. The figures as they stand do not exactly represent the amount of "polishing off" that sometimes takes place, because it often happens that the number of cases taken at a sitting is considerably greater than the average; where the average amounts to 300 or more, the rapidity of the "polishing off" process must be of the most terrific kind when an exceptionally long list is taken. One of the London courts only a few weeks ago performed the wonderful feat of "trying" 350 causes between half past ten in the morning and half past one in the afternoon, and of these only three came before the judge. This was in a court where the average number of cases per sitting is put down at a few over 100.

1868.—Table showing the average number of cases set down for hearing at each sitting of the Courts issuing over 5,000 plaints. (The Courts bracketed together are presided over by the same judge.)

WE MENTIONED, ante p. 244, that two rules nisi had been granted in the Common Pleas which raised important questions as to the allowance to a successful plaintiff of his costs on taxation in certain cases.

In the first case, Vickery v. The Brighton Railway Company, it was said that only one counsel should be allowed, on executing a writ of enquiry, to assess damages; but when the rule came on for argument this point was abandoned, in consequence of a decision in the Court of Exchequer since the rule nisi had been granted, that two counsel might be allowed in the Master's discretion. With regard to the other point, as to the costs of a "good jury," the Court has taken time to consider its judgment; and, as a few days previously the same point had been raised and the decision on it reversed in the Exchequer, it is probable that the decision of the latter Court will settle the matter.

In the other case, Sinclair v. The Great Eastern Railway Company, the Court, by a rather strained interpretation of the report, decided that Hawkins v. Rigby, 29 L. J. C. P. 229, did not lay down any such inflexible rule against allowing two counsel on a reference as had been supposed; thus bringing the practice of the Court into conformity with that of the Queen's Bench and Exchequer. It need scarcely be said that we consider these decisions satisfactory, as they quite bear out the views we expressed in our previous remarks on the subject.

THE DECISION OF THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER in Boulton v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the interpretation of the words "further or other valuable consideration" in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16, is one of extreme importance. The Court were unanimous and very decided in considering that where in a lease reserving a rent the lessees covenanted to build, such covenant is a "further or other valuable consideration" within the meaning of the enactment, and therefore requires the further stamp duty there mentioned. No cases were cited in argument or judgment.

We do not consider that the case is by any means as clear as the Court seemed to think it. It is, however, scarcely worth while to discuss this point now. If the decision is right, the Act is badly drawn, and needs amendment; and if the decision is wrong, the judge-made law should be altered. In point of fact, we believe that the framers of the section had in their minds a particular form of lease, passed between a Devonshire nobleman and a town corporation; but it is very unlikely that they contemplated the wide scope now given to their handiwork, or the matter would not have remained so long in abeyance. We understand that the Commissioners do not intend to charge covenants to repair under this section, and a correspondent sends us a letter from the Solicitor of Inland Revenue, informing him that if deeds are, within a reasonable time, tendered for stamping in accordance with this decision, the Commissioners do not propose to exact the penalty.

We believe that a bill will be introduced during the approaching session to remove this hardship which has so suddenly been inflicted upon the public, and in all probability this piece of legislation will be, as it should be, retrospective. Meanwhile we hear from all sides of the most difficult questions arising as to whether or not particular covenants are or are not obnoxious to the rule laid down in Boulton's case—an additional reason for speedy legislation.

"THE MAGIC OF RED PAINT."

In speaking recently of the case of Lanesborough v. Reilly we expressed an opinion that the Court of Common Pleas was not coerced, as it seemed to think, to do the injustice which was admittedly done by its decision in that case, and that they might well have decided in favour of the plaintiff consistently with the law, and without in any manner impairing the parliamentary title of the Landed Estates Court conveyances.

We rest this opinion on two distinct grounds, either of which is, if valid, sufficient to support it, and both of which seem to us to be of general, though far from equal, significance. We will take the narrower point first, because it can be the more simply disposed of.

We submit then, that giving the very widest possible effect to the conveyances of the Landed Estates Court, that Court had not in fact conveyed the disputed land to Mrs. Reilly, and that the fact that it had not done so appeared on the face of the document itself. The judge purported in that case to grant under his statutory powers—what? All that and those the parcels thereafter described; and which were therein accurately described and their quantity distinctly defined; and then reference is—by way of further description—made to an incorrect map. This appears to us to be a mere falsa demonstratio, and as such harmless alongside of the accurate detailed description in the body of the deed. Even as against a purchaser for value from Mrs. Reilly this would seem to be the case, because no person could properly examine the deed without perceiving the discrepancy, and he would thereupon be put upon inquiry as to which of the conflicting descriptions was the true one. If this be not so, what is the rule to be applied to such a case? Suppose the map had shown too little instead of too much. Would Mrs. Reilly have had no remedy? We cannot suppose that the rule that the deed is to be taken most strongly against the grantor applies to the case, because the grantor is the Crown—or, what comes to the same thing, the Legislature—and the rule applicable to Crown grants would have avoided the present deed altogether for uncertainty. Are we to assume then that the purchaser is entitled to read the grant whatever way suits him best, without regard to the facts of the case or the intention of the Court, and that even when the error is patent? That would be to offer a premium for clerical errors. And yet, unless we adopt some one of these hypotheses, it is hard to see how the conveyance in question in this case had the tortious operation ascribed to it. In this respect the case differs from all those previously decided, and the present judgment, if undisturbed, seems irresistibly to lead to the utterly inadmissible conclusion that the construction of conveyances executed by this Court is to proceed on a principle not applicable to any other public document (legal or political) whatever.

But independently of this objection, the case raises a very important question as to the jurisdiction of the Court. The land in dispute in this case was not the subject of any proceeding in the Court, and it is clear that in such case the Act confers no direct jurisdiction on the Court to deal with it, and it is at least extremely doubtful whether it confers validity on the conveyances if the Court should do so in error. This point, which is obviously one of considerable importance, was expressly reserved by the House of Lords in Errington v. Rorke (7 H. L. 617), and deserves, we think, a more careful consideration than it seems as yet to have received.

The Landed Estates Court is the creation of statute (21 & 22 Vict. c. 72), and has no power, authority, or jurisdiction whatever not to be found within the four corners of that statute. That is the very foundation of the judgments in Re Walsh (15 W. R. 1115) and the present case, and is at any rate uncontroverted and incontrovertible. What then is the jurisdiction thereby given? The Act recites the Incumbered Estates Courts Acts, and that it is desirable to establish a permanent court with similar, but more extended, powers. It then proceeds to constitute the Court and define its officers, &c., with which we have here nothing to do, and then after providing for the transfer of the then pending business in the Incumbered Estates Court (which does not concern us), and a number of regulations respecting procedure and otherwise, not affecting the present question, we come at last (section 37) to the section conferring jurisdiction "for the investigation of title, and for ascertaining and allowing incumbrances and charges, and the amounts due thereon, and settling the priorities of such incumbrances and charges respectively, and the rights of owners and others, and generally for ascertaining, declaring and allowing the rights of all persons in any land, in respect of which application may be made under this Act, or in the money to raise from sales under this Act, upon such application," with certain ancillary powers in respect thereof, but no extension of jurisdiction as regards the land to be affected. The sections thenceforward to section 42 are occupied with regulations as to procedure and appeals; by sections 43—5, power is given to various classes of persons to apply for a sale; sections 46—8 do not refer to sales; sections 49 and 50 refer only to sales by direction of the Courts of Bankruptcy or Chancery, sections 51 and 52 to registration with an indefeasible title without sale, and it is not till we arrive at section 53 that anything further bearing on our subject appears. By that section (the marginal note whereof is "Power to sell and proceedings thereon") it is provided that, "If upon any application for a sale," or in any of the other cases already mentioned, "it shall appear to the judge that a sale or conveyance of the land to which the application, decree, or order, may relate, or any part thereof, may be found expedient, he shall" direct such proceedings as therein mentioned, and "it shall be lawful for him at his discretion to make or refuse an order for the sale of all or any part of such land," or for the other purposes not relating to sales.

By section 52, where a sale shall be made or a conveyance directed under the Act, the judge is to ascertain the tenancies and other rights affecting "the land or part thereof to be so sold," and the covenants affecting "such lands" and the boundaries "thereof;" and he is empowered to give directions as to the proper inquiries and notices for that purpose; and all persons having any claim in respect thereof are to make such claims to the Court, which has power to adjudicate thereon, and the decision of the judge is to be final and conclusive "as to all persons whomsoever" subject to the appeal given by the Act, and the judge is in his conveyance to state the incumbrances and other rights affecting the land. By section 55 "the land to which such order shall relate" is to be sold by the Court, and the judge is empowered to convey the same, and the execution by any other party is made "unnecessary." Then follow a number of provisions respecting the dealing with the purchase-money, to which we need not refer, and then we arrive, after certain other provisions immaterial to our present purpose, at section 61, which, so far as material, is as follows:—

"Every such conveyance executed as aforesaid by the said judge purporting to pass an estate in fee-simple shall be effectual to pass the fee-simple and inheritance of the land, subject to all such charges, tenancies, rights of common or other easements, leases and underleases as may be expressed or referred to therein as aforesaid; but save as aforesaid and as hereinafter provided, discharged from all former and other estates, rights, titles, charges, and incumbrances whatsoever of her Majesty, her heirs and successors, and of all other persons whomsoever."

By section 71 land included in different applications may be included in the same sale, and by section 83 the Court may, upon the application of any persons, owners of any land in Ireland "not subject to be sold under this Act, or as to which no proceedings for a sale under this Act shall be pending," allot such lands in parcels to be held by such owners in severalty, instead of the lands to which they were theretofore entitled, and such allotment is to be binding, and the lands so allotted are to go to the same uses, and subject to the same conditions, charges, and incumbrances as the lands for which they are respectively substituted.

These are, with the exception shortly to be noticed, the only provisions in the Act which appear to be in any manner germane to our present subject, and it is easy to see that they do not confer any jurisdiction in the Court to deal in any manner with land not the subject of a pending application. True, any conveyance affecting any land then in the hands of the Court is made incontrovertible, however unjust, and this has been held to include a portion of a townland let for ever at a peppercorn rent, where the whole townland was sold in one lot, and was all (subject to this lease, which was not noticed in the conveyance) actually the property of the owner whose estate was for sale. But it is a very different thing to enable the Court to disregard defects of title in the land actually within its grasp, and to enable it to convey irremediably (or, for that matter, at all) land which was never subjected to its control, and as to which it has made none of the inquiries and taken none of the precautions required by the Act. If the Court of Appeal in Chancery be right it would follow that if upon the sale of a townland (let us call it Ardmore) situate in say, Kerry, a part of the estate of a gentleman himself petitioning for a sale and cognisant of all the proceedings, the copyist who engrossed the deed were, from carelessness or accident, or even by the grossest fraud, if only the purchaser were not party or privy thereto, to describe the county as "Kildare," and the purchaser could find within the limits of that county a townland called Ardmore (and there are probably two or three such in every county in Ireland), belonging to some one who had never had any dealings with the Court, nor any notice of its proceedings, he might, although the value of that townland might, to his knowledge, be ten times greater than that of the land he purchased, insist on taking and keeping possession of the land thus affected to be conveyed to him. A proposition so monstrous, which amounts to this, that no vigilance whatever can give the smallest security to any landowner in Ireland, is too shocking to human reason to be accepted, except on the most irrefragable grounds. For if this doctrine hold in the case of an adjoining owner who has express notice, as Lord Lanesborough had, that the boundaries of his estate are known, and that it is not intended to interfere with him, it must a fortiori apply to the case of a stranger who has no notice of any sort whatever.

If this monstrous proposition be supportable at all it must be by force only of the 85th section of the Act, which is as follows:—

"Every conveyance, assignment and declaration, respectively executed as required by this Act, and every order for partition, or for exchange, or for division and allotment, made by the Court under its seal, shall for all purposes be conclusive evidence that every application, proceeding, consent, and act whatsoever, which ought to have been made, given, and done previously to the execution of such conveyance, assignment or declaration, or the making of such order respectively, has been made, given, and done by the persons authorised to make, give, and do the same; and no such conveyance, assignment, declaration or order shall be impeached by reason of any informality therein; and every such order shall operate, and may be registered in the office for registering deeds in Ireland, in like manner as if conveyances by way of partition, exchange, division or allotment had been executed for such purposes."

If this provision is intended merely for the protection of bonâ fide purchasers, and may be taken as a sort of extension of the maxim "omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta," it is entirely in accordance with the general tenor of the Act, and not extravagantly opposed to natural justice; but for this purpose it must be strictly limited to defects of procedure, or at all events to omissions of which the grantee of the estate has been bonâ fide ignorant, and in respect of which he has trusted implicitly to the vigilance of the Court. But does this provision enure to the benefit of a party who knows (as a matter of fact) that no such application, proceeding, &c., was ever made? On the general principle on which Acts of Parliament, in common with other legal documents, are interpreted, we should say "no," but the judges of the Court of Appeal have deliberately replied "yes." This decision is directly opposed to the principle of the decisions in the Registry Acts, which made notice sufficient to exclude the statutory priority; it is opposed to doctrine which takes so many cases in equity out of the Statute of Frauds; it is opposed to the long course of decisions which restrain the force of general words by reference to the context; it is above all opposed to the principle of this very Act itself, which is intended to give perfect security to bonâ fide purchasers from this Court. For, if the principle of this decision is to prevail, the vaunted Landed Estates Court titles themselves are perfectly valueless; for if by the fraud or carelessness of a clerk the judge should happen to sign a duplicate of your conveyance the day after you have taken it away and paid for it, the fortunate possessor of the later document, for which it may be he has never paid one penny, will be able at pleasure to oust you of your Parliamentary estate; nay, even if the judge were (and such a case is, though in the highest degree improbable, certainly conceivable) fraudulently to execute a secret conveyance to his own son of the whole estate of, say, the Duke of Devonshire, and to deliver it over to that son (who may be supposed to be, until the deed is delivered to him, ignorant of the fraud) the Court of Appeal would be bound to hold, not only that the fraud (to which the grantee is not originally privy) is to prevail, not only that the judge himself, on coming to his right mind, is absolutely powerless to undo the wrong, but that no means short of an ex post facto Act of Parliament—in itself a flagrant violation of natural justice—can prevent the consummation of the iniquity! But if the section in question be read secundum subjectam materiam, and as a protection to bonâ fide purchasers against irregularities of procedure and informality merely—and it will at least well bear this construction—no such absurdity arises, and the Act, if not altogether just, is at least consistent with justice. But then there is left no foundation for the judgment in question. Certainly if what took place in Lanesborough v. Reilly is to be law in Ireland, English investors will have an increasing distrust for Irish land investments.

ACTIONS AGAINST CARRIERS.

II.

In our last article on this subject we examined the principal authorities upon the question whether the consignor or the consignee is the proper person to sue a carrier for not properly carrying goods. The difficulty caused by some of these cases arises rather from the inaccurate way in which the reasons for the decisions are given than from the decisions themselves. The result of these decisions may be thus shortly stated. The proper person to sue a carrier for not properly carrying goods is the person with whom the carrier contracted, and the ownership of the goods does not directly affect this question, but it may be most important evidence for the purpose of showing with whom the carrier did in fact contract. It must also always be borne in mind that many of these decisions are in terms based rather upon the ownership of the goods than upon the question of contract; but there is no decision, although many dicta, inconsistent with the principle which we have stated as the result of the decisions.

In no one of these cases has it been held that a plaintiff who in fact agreed with the carrier for the carriage, and to whom the promise was made, and from whom the consideration moved, was not entitled to sue. On the contrary, in Joseph v. Knox (3 Camp. 320), Davis v. James (5 Burr. 2680), and Moore v. Wilson (1 T. R. 659) the direct opposite has been held. There is, therefore, no authority for saying that contracts for the carriage of goods are governed by principles different from those which regulate other contracts. All the cases on the point are in accordance with the application of the usual principles respecting contracts in general, although there are dicta and expressions which are inconsistent with the application of those principles. The confusion has arisen, as we said at the outset, from not clearly distinguishing between the right of action and the evidence of the contract from which the right of action springs.

When it is once established that contracts of carriage are subject to the same rules as other contracts, the questions arising out of these are deprived of most of their difficulty, as there is then authority and principle as to the mode of dealing with such questions. One of the consequences of treating these contracts as all other simple contracts, is that when a consignor contracts in his own name with the carrier, but in fact contracts as agent for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue on this contract. This is the ordinary rule, and it has been expressly recognised as applicable in actions against carriers. In Sargent v. Morris (3 B. & Ald. 280), Bayley, J., speaking of contracts between a consignor or consignee and a carrier, says: "I take the rule to be this, if an agent acts for me and on my behalf, but in his own name, then, inasmuch as he is the person with whom the contract is made, it is no answer to an action in his name to say that he is merely an agent unless you can also show that he is prohibited from carrying on that action by the person on whose behalf the contract was made. In such cases, however, you may bring your action either in the name of the party by whom the contract was made, or in that of the party for whom the contract was made."

The question whether the consignor or the consignee is the proper person to sue has arisen, as appears from some of the cases we have cited, where goods are carried by sea as well as where they are carried by land, and the same principles have been applied to both cases. There is, however, this difference in fact, though not in law, between the two classes of cases, that goods carried by sea are usually shipped under a bill of lading which, more or less, fully describes the terms on which the goods are to be carried, and the parties to the contract. The existence of the written contract in these cases thus renders it more easy to ascertain who were really the parties to the contract. The late statute, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111 (the Bills of Lading Act), by which bills of lading are rendered negotiable, has still further simplified the rights of parties under bills of lading.

Thus far we have dealt with the question who is the proper party to sue a carrier on the contract of carriage, and we have found that the true result of the cases is, that the person with whom the carrier contracted should be plaintiff, as in any other action of contract. Carriers, however, may be liable to actions which really depend entirely upon the ownership of the goods carried, and which are wholly independent of any contract. If a carrier refuse to give up goods in his possession to their owner, he is liable to an action of trover at the suit of the owner, no matter from whom he received them. So, also, it seems that a carrier might be liable to the owner for a direct trespass to the goods, as if he destroyed them, although the owner was no party to the contract by which the goods came into the hands of the carrier. But not only may carriers be liable to these actions of pure tort, wholly unconnected with any contract, but they may also be liable to the owner of goods qua owner for negligence in their carriage. This liability does not affect the liability on the contract of carriage which we have been discussing, but is a further liability collateral to the obligation created by the contract. The principal authorities for this proposition are the two cases, Marshall v. The Yorkshire, &c., Railway Company (11 C. B. 655), and Collett v. London and North Western Railway Company (16 Q. B. 984). The rule, supported by reference to these two cases, is thus broadly laid down in the last (3rd) edition of "Addison on Torts," p. 914—"Every person who enters upon the performance of the work of carrying merchandise or passengers is bound to exercise due and proper care and skill in the performance. Whether the work is done under a contract or gratuitously, every person who has been injured by the negligent performance of the work of carrying is entitled, as we have seen, to an action against the carriers, although he is no party to the contract under which the work was done."

Collett v. The London, &c., Railway Company may perhaps be dismissed at once as being somewhat peculiar in its facts, as the liability to carry arose directly under a statute and not from any contract. In Marshall v. Yorkshire, &c., Railway Company a servant whose master had paid for the carriage of his luggage was held entitled to sue the defendants for the loss of the luggage on the ground that the defendants' duty arose not "from a contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, but by reason of a duty irrespective of the contract." It was not suggested that the master could not have sued on the contract, but it was held that the servant could sue independently of the contract. This is really the only direct authority for the very sweeping rule which we have just quoted, and some doubt may be felt as to whether this case is a sufficient authority for the rule as stated. The rule deals with the case of the carriage of goods in the same way as with the carriage of persons.

There is no doubt that if A. contracts with B. to carry X., B. is liable for a breach of contract to A., and also liable to B. for any injury B. may sustain in consequence of negligent carriage. This rule may be supported by holding that A. really in such a case enters into his contract with B. and X. respectively, and, if so, he is, of course, under a double obligation. It has, however, never been clearly laid down that the same rule can be applied to goods, and indeed many inconveniences might follow from its application. Marshall v. Yorkshire, &c., Railway Company is the case which has gone the furthest in this direction, but it can hardly be considered a sufficient authority for the universal application of the same rule in this respect to cases of carriage of goods as of persons. It must also be remembered that there the defendants were common carriers, and some stress was laid upon this in the judgments.

We have noticed these somewhat peculiar cases because they may sometimes have a bearing on the main question which we have discussed in this and the preceding article. They do not, however, in any way militate against that which we have ventured to lay down as the true rule for ascertaining whether the consignor or the consignee is the proper person to sue a carrier, but they form a somewhat peculiar class of actions, the principles of which can hardly be yet considered as quite settled.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

LLOYDS' BONDS.

Re Cork & Youghal Railway Company, L. C. & L. J. G., 18 W. R. 27.

The 19th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85 was aimed at the practice of evading, by means of the instruments known as Lloyd's Bonds, the limits imposed by Parliament on the borrowing powers of railway companies. Prima facie, all corporations are bound by their acts under seal, but when the corporation is by statute created for particular purposes and limited to special powers, a deed is not binding on the corporation, if it appears by an express provision of the statute a reasonable inference from its enactments, that the deed was ultra vires (Lord Wensleydale in South Yorkshire Railway Company v. Great Northern Railway Company, 9 Ex. 55, 84). Such is the case when a company issues a debenture for money raised in excess of its borrowing powers. But the giving of a security for money already due does not fall within the description of "raising money" and "Lloyds' Bonds" are debentures on which, after reciting that so much money is due from the company to the obligor, the company, in consideration of his forbearance, give under their seal an undertaking to pay the sum with specified interest on a day named in the debenture. These bonds were originally, and have been usually, though, of course, not invariably, given to contractors. In the original instances the company wanted money, had exhausted its powers, and the contractor refused to go on if not paid. Then the company gave him a debenture in the above form, which, to the extent of the company's debt to him at the time, was a perfectly legal and valid security. But the essence of the shift which came to be effected by these bonds was that they were given, not as security for money already owing, but to cover debts in future. The bond recited that the sum was owing by the company to the obligee, when in reality no such sum was owing, the intention being that the obligee should go into the market and raise money on the bond, with which to perform for the company the work they required done. Then, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, s. 19, after reciting the practise of borrowing on notes purporting to secure repayment of advances already made, enacted that thereafter the issuing of any negotiable or assignable instrument as security for money advanced to the company ultra vires its statutory powers of raising money, should be an offence for which the company should forfeit to the Crown double the amount of the sum purported to be secured; and thus this enactment, not directly, but by implication, declared such securities invalid. These bonds came in question in Chambers v. Manchester & Milford Railway Company (12 W. R. 980, 5 B. & S. 588), in which Blackburn, J., pointed out that though such an instrument might throw on the company the onus of showing that the debt was not due, it could not create one where none existed, and an assignee would be in no better position than the original obligee or covenantor. Nor can such an instrument be enforced in equity when it would not be enforceable at law, for as Lord Justice Giffard observes in the present case, "there is no ground whatever for the argument that a contract or instrument which fails in a court of law by reason of illegality, can nevertheless be enforced in equity because money has been paid for it. Equitable terms can be imposed on a plaintiff seeking to set aside an illegal contract, as the price of the relief he asks, but as to any claim sought to be actively enforced, the defence of illegality is as available in a court of equity as it is in the court of law."

The Court of Equity would, of course, grant an injunction against the issue of illegal instruments, as it would against the commission of any other act ultra vires. In White v. Carmarthenshire Railway Company (12 W. R. 68, 1 H. & M. 786), the company were applying to Parliament for an extension of their borrowing powers (which they succeeded in obtaining), and meanwhile they made an arrangement with their contractor that he should proceed with their works, and that they should give him a debenture for deferred payment, intending to pay out of the money they hoped to be authorised to raise, he taking the bonds as evidence of the obligation. Vice-Chancellor Wood, upon a bill filed by a shareholder to restrain the issue of such bonds, said he could not hold that the transaction was illegal. The facts of this case are rather special, but we confess that the decision does not appear to us satisfactory; the company not actually possessing power to borrow, we cannot see that any difference is made by the fact that they were endeavouring to obtain it, no matter with what expectation of success. Very possibly the ratio decidendi has not been well reported. In the present case, the present Lord Chancellor refers to his decision as follows:—"Where a contractor was willing to give his services and to take his chance of being paid, with such remedy as he could insist upon by bringing an action against the company and recovering judgment, I held that the contractor, having elected so to act, and having proceeded to take some steps towards so acting, the company were authorised in giving him a debenture." From which it would seem that an ingredient of the decision was the fact of the contractor having previously committed himself to expense.

But although a company has exhausted its borrowing powers, and is incapacitated by this enactment from giving any valid security upon which an advance may be discounted, it may incur debts, though it cannot borrow. If this were otherwise, the operations of the company must cease forthwith. The company can incur debts and be sued on those debts, and though the assignee of a Lloyd's bond can, as a creditor on bond, have no better position than the original obligor had, yet if he has in point of fact advanced on the bond money which has been bona fide applied for the company's purposes, he is to that extent a creditor, not a secured creditor, but a simple contract creditor. Thus the Master of the Rolls held in Troup's case (Re Electric Telegraph Company of Ireland), 9 W. R. 878, 29 Beav. 353, that though prima facie the lender of money borrowed ultra vires cannot enforce its repayment, he may do so wherever it has been so bona fide applied.

That was the principle of the decision in the case before us. Bonds were given containing the usual recital, though nothing was owing to the obligor; he discounted them in the market, and the money so raised was, or most of it was, applied in discharging the company's pressing obligations. The railway was subsequently sold under a special Act, and the bondholders put in a claim to surplus proceeds in priority to the shareholders. Vice-Chancellor Malins held that, the company having had the benefit of the money advanced on the bonds, the bonds became a debt on the property of the company. The Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice merely varied this decision by directing an inquiry how much had been bona fide applied in payment of sums recoverable from the company.

The shareholders had, at a general meeting, passed resolutions expressly approving the issue of the bonds, but the Court of Appeal held that this was irrelevant, it not being in the power of the meeting to sanction an act ultra vires.

COMMON LAW.

DEDICATION OF RIGHT OF WAY—LIMITED DEDICATION—RIGHT TO PLOUGH UP HIGHWAY.

Mercer v. Woodgate, Q. B., 18 W. R. 116.

When this case was decided it attracted more attention from the public than is usually bestowed upon a judgment on a point of law. The decision is, however, not new in principle, although the precise facts which raised the question in discussion do not appear to have been judicially considered before. The principle of the decision is, that although there cannot be a dedication of a highway to a limited part of the public, there may yet be a limited dedication of a way to the whole public, following Poole v. Huskisson (11 M. & W. 830).

Mercer v. Woodgate was an appeal from a conviction on an information before justices against the appellant for ploughing up a public path that ran over his land. The path had been used by the public, and ploughed up from time to time by the occupiers of the land, as far back as living memory went. There was no further evidence as to the dedication of the way to the public. It was held that this was evidence of a dedication of the way to the public, subject to the right to plough it up at the proper seasons of the year; that is, the evidence was held to show a limited, and not an unlimited, dedication. As we have said, this is no new principle. The only substantial question in the case was whether the dedication, as a matter of fact, was or was not a limited dedication subject to the right to plough.

Of course if an unlimited dedication had once been established, no length of time would have given a right to plough up the way. So to interfere with a highway would be a public nuisance, and indictable as such, and no right to commit an indictable offence could be gained by prescription. In Mercer v. Woodgate the right to plough up the soil of the public way had never been given up, and on this ground judgment was given for the appellant.

CRIMINAL LAW.

FORGERY—ANTE-DATING DEED.

Reg v. Ritson, C.C.R., 18 W. R. 73.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 20, enacts that "whosoever . . . shall forge or alter . . . any deed . . . shall be guilty of felony." There is no definition in the statute of the word "forge," and the question in this case was whether fraudulently ante-dating a deed when the date of the essence of the deed was "forgery." The Court held that it was forgery. They distinguish it, however, from the case of a false statement in a deed which, although fraudulent, would not necessarily be forgery. The crime of forgery is the making of a false instrument—i.e., of an instrument which purports to be that which it is not. A false statement in an instrument does not necessarily, although it may, make the instrument a false instrument. A false statement of the date of execution will make the instrument false when the date is essential to the validity of the instrument, but not otherwise.

This decision agrees with the definitions of forgery given in the best text-books, but it is so far a new point that there is no modern case in which the question has been decided.

LARCENY—"TAKING."

Reg. v. MacGrath, C.C.R., 18 W. R. 119.

Larceny is the "taking and carrying away the goods of another against his will, with the felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use." Many cases have been decided on the question, what is a "taking" sufficient to constitute larceny? It has been decided that a taking by force or by means of a trick is sufficient. In Reg. v. MacGrath there was a taking which was neither by force nor by a successful fraud, but by a curious combination of both, and it was held that a taking of goods from their owner against his will may amount to a larceny, although the taking is neither by means of a successful trick nor by force sufficient to constitute a robbery. Apparently, the point has never before been expressly decided in any reported case. The material facts in Reg. v. MacGrath, were: The prosecutrix went into a room where an auction appeared to be going on. The auctioneer pretended that she had made a bid for an article for which she had not bid, as he knew. He, in concert with others, said that she should not leave the room without paying the amount of her alleged bid. She paid the money. No actual force was used towards her, and she was not deceived by the trick, but paid the money to be allowed to leave the room. On an indictment for stealing the money so paid it was held that the taking of the money amounted to larceny, even although there might not have been sufficient violence to constitute a robbery, and although the money was not obtained by any deception. The court did not decide whether or not a robbery had in fact been committed.

It was stated, or assumed, in the judgments that were delivered that if actual violence had been used to obtain the money the taking would clearly have been a larceny, because the crime of robbery or forcible taking of goods from the person, which necessarily includes larceny, would have been committed. It was also assumed that if the money had been obtained by a trick, as by inducing the prosecutrix to believe that she had made a bid, a larceny would have been committed. The decision, however, goes a little further than former cases, and establishes the principle that if goods are obtained from a person against his will, even without actual force or successful fraud, there is a "taking" sufficient to constitute a larceny, the essence of which crime is, in the words of the old definitions, the taking invito domino.

ADMIRALTY.

COSTS—INSPECTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The Memphis, Adm., 18 W. R. 74.

This case decided that applicants for an order to inspect documents will be condemned in costs, although successful in their application, if they have not made a previous request to the other side to allow such inspection. This course was adopted in a former case, The Rapid (27th July, 1869, not reported), and Sir R. Phillimore expressed an intention to adhere to this practice for the future.

REVIEWS.

A Manual of the Law and Practice of Bankruptcy, as amended and consolidated by the Statutes of 1869, with an Appendix containing the Statutes, Orders, and Forms. By JOHN F. BULLEY, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, and JOHN WILLIAM WILLIS BUND, M.A., LL.B., Caius College, Cambridge, Chancellor's Legal Medallist, Professor of Constitutional Law, University College, London, and of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: Butterworths. 1870.

We may safely congratulate Messrs. Bulley and Bund upon having run, and run successfully, the most singular race against time that we have ever met with. The rules and forms in bankruptcy under the late Act were issued on the first day of the year; and by about the middle of the month the present work, founded, of course, as much upon those rules as upon anything else, was in the hands of the public. In the case of a book thus produced at racing speed one naturally looks for oversights and omissions, and especially in those parts of the book which are founded upon the latest matter, and which must therefore have been composed with extreme rapidity. But the peculiarity of this book seems to us to be that the parts which deal with mere matters of practice, and are founded upon the rules, and must therefore have been written and hurried through the press within a fortnight, are wonderfully well done; the chief defects lie in those chapters which are independent of the rules, and might well have been written at leisure.

We will look first at Chapter I. which is entitled an Introductory Chapter, and which, we are told in the preface, "gives a brief sketch of the rise and progress of bankrupt law from the time of its origin to the present time." In such a sketch what we naturally expect to find is, that the great turning points in the history of the law, the first introduction of broad principles, shall be clearly pointed out, and that brevity shall be secured by the omission of comparatively unimportant details. But Messrs. Bulley and Bund have acted on no such principle. The most important parts in the history of the law are omitted altogether, while prominence is given to matters of very inferior importance. For example, in the course of the history the authors come to the two statutes the 4 Anne, c. 17 and 5 Anne, c. 22; and they speak of them thus:—"By the statute 4 Anne, c. 17 it was provided that if bankrupts against whom a commission was awarded did not, after notice of the commission, surrender themselves within thirty days, and did not discover their effects to the commissioners they should suffer death as felons. This Act was amended in the next year, by the statute 5 Anne, c. 22, which extended the punishment of death to those bankrupts who carried away or hid their goods. It also provided that no bankrupt should obtain a discharge of his debts unless four-fifths in number and value of his creditors signed a certificate authorising such discharge, and that no commission should be issued out on the petition of a single creditor unless his debt amounted to the sum of £100 and upwards. Farmers, graziers, and drovers of cattle, and receivers of taxes were exempted from the operation of the bankrupt laws." Now, would not anyone reading this without previous knowledge suppose that the discharge of the bankrupt had been an integral part of the bankruptcy system from the first, and that the only effect of these Acts of Queen Anne was to introduce a restriction upon that discharge? Yet the fact is that the discharge of the bankrupt was an entire novelty introduced by the first-mentioned of these two Acts, the 4 Anne, c. 17. The authors have thus not taken the trouble to point out the introduction of by far the most remarkable and characteristic point in our bankruptcy system, though the very Act which established it is referred to for another purpose. This is probably the gravest omission which could have been made in a history of the law of bankruptcy. But this is not all. Next to the discharge of the debtor, perhaps the most remarkable element in the bankruptcy law, is the vesting of the assets in a person selected by and acting for the creditors. This was introduced for the first time by the second of the two Acts first referred to, the 5 Anne, c. 22; but the subject is never mentioned by the authors in dealing with the Act, though such comparatively trivial provisions as that fixing the limit of the petitioning creditor's debt are carefully set out. Further on in the chapter, p. 13, we come to the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, which was in the main a consolidation Act, though it made many changes in the details of the law. This is abstracted at great length, no less than six pages being given to it. Very similar in character, and not less important in the changes which it introduced, was the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act (inaccurately called "the Bankruptcy Act"), 1849. This is dismissed in nine lines; we are simply told that, as it has been wholly repealed, it is unnecessary to enter into the details of its provisions in extenso. How the fact of an Act having been repealed can be a reason for omitting it in a history of the law, we fail to see. And as for the Act of 1861, it is dismissed in the same summary way, on the ground, first, that it is "almost too well-known to require comment," secondly, that it is repealed. But at any rate in a history of the bankrupt law it was worth while to point out at what date that law was extended to non-traders as well as traders. In failing to do this, however, the authors were not inconsistent; for though it is undoubtedly possible with care to discover from this chapter when the distinction between traders and non-traders was first introduced, we believe nine people out of ten would well-read page 3 without finding out that the distinction was a novelty in the 13 Eliz. c. 7.

We can only give one more example of the kind of fault of which we speak. The new Act has a proviso to the definition of traders in Schedule 1, to the effect that "a member of any partnership, association, or company which cannot be adjudged bankrupt under this Act" shall not be deemed as such a trader. And by section 5, "a partnership, association, or company corporate, or registered under the Companies Act, 1862, shall not be adjudged bankrupt under this Act." The present authors, in explaining who are traders, profess, on page 57, to give the proviso in question, but they omit the words which we have printed in italics. And we cannot be quite certain that this is a mere printer's error, though we suppose it must be so, for the discussion which follows, and which occupies more than two pages, is a most singular tangle, and succeeds in leaving doubtful what the Act has made perfectly plain, namely, that no member of any joint stock company can as such be a trader for the purposes of bankruptcy. The source of the authors' confusion seems to have been, not distinguishing between the older acts, which spoke of "incorporated companies established by charter or Act of Parliament," and the new Act which speaks of a "company corporate."

Of those parts of the book which deal with practice pure and simple, we are glad to be able to speak very favourably. The classification of the various sections of the Act, and the rules founded upon them, the connecting them properly together, the insertion of the necessary references from place to place and subject to subject, and the division of the whole into proper heads, is a work of much labour, and requiring judgment and accuracy. And, considering the extreme speed with which it must have been done, we think the result wonderfully satisfactory. Of course we cannot say that there may not be errors or omissions in this part of the work, but we have not met with them. The index, however, leaves much to be desired.

The Law of Compensation under the Lands Clauses and Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts, the Metropolis Local Management and other Acts, &c., with a full Collection of Forms and Precedents. By ERNEST LLOYD, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Second edition. London: Stevens & Haynes.

The object of this book appears to be to present to the reader a well-arranged digest of the cases that have been decided upon the law of compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation and other Acts. It is intended for use as a book of practice, and does not deal with any question of principle except by direct reference to decided cases. The plan of the book is well carried out, and it forms on the whole a very good specimen of a digest of cases in the form of a text-book.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is the foundation of the law of compensation, and the provisions of this statute are stated in the text in a more readable form than they appear in the Act itself, and with these provisions are interwoven the many decisions to which the statute has given rise. Sometimes, but not often, the exact words of a particular section are given in the text, but generally their effect only is stated, with a reference to the statute. The Lands Clauses Act, to which of course reference is most frequently made, is printed verbatim in an appendix. The book thus consists almost entirely of statements of the effect of sections of statutes and decided cases, arranged in a series of propositions. This work has been carefully done, although in several instances the facts of cases have been inserted at unnecessary length. The last two chapters deal with compensation under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and some other Acts which contain provisions on the subject of compensation.

The decided cases have been carefully inserted up to the time when the book went to press. The way, however, in which the references to the cases are given is very curious. We have not been able to discover what principle, if any, has guided the author in selecting the report to which he gives the reference of a case. Sometimes as many as four references to different contemporaneous reports are given to a case on one page, and on another page the same case is found with only one or two of such references. For instance, at page 2 a reference to Ferrar v. Commissioners of Sewers of London is given to the W. R., L. R., and L. J. At pages 72 and 87 the references are to the L. J. only, while at page 97 the reference to the L. J. is omitted altogether and references are given to the W. R. and L. R. So also we find Sparrow v. Oxford &c. Railway Company with references to Hare and the L. J. at page 15, to the L. J. only at page 19, to De G. M. & N. only at page 23, and at page 24 to De G. M. & N. and to the L. J. The same carelessness in giving references is observable in other places. This is very inconvenient, for a reader never knows whether the want of a reference to a particular series of reports is caused by the fact that the case is not reported there or by the author's fancy for excluding those reports in that instance.

There is a useful set of precedents at the end of the book which will be found very convenient in practice. Some of these precedents might, indeed, have been very well omitted, as not having any special reference to the subject of the book, as, amongst others, the precedents of notices to produce and to admit documents at an arbitration, which are in the usual and well-known form. There is a good index and table of contents, but a table of statutes is still much wanted, which would show at a glance all the places in the book where any particular section of a statute is dealt with. This is by far the most ready, and indeed only certain, way of ascertaining whether there have been any decisions upon a given section. Notwithstanding, however, some faults of detail, the book will be found a useful and practical treatise on the subject to which it relates.

A System of Shorthand. By THOMAS GURNEY. First published in 1740, and subsequently improved. 17th Edition. London: Butterworths.

It is not necessary, especially when addressing lawyers, to expatiate on the advantages of shorthand writing. Lawyers employ the shorthand writer or use the result of his labours, perhaps oftener than any other class of persons. It is said, and with truth, that come what may, a good shorthand writer can always make an income, and a practicable command of the art much enhances the usefulness, and consequently the market value, of a solicitor's or barrister's clerk. As a legal journal, we shall not be expected to criticise the book before us "on the merits." There are several shorthand systems which compete for the first place, and each has its advocates. We believe that those known as "Gurney's" and "Pitman's" are the favourites. It is difficult to judge by results. A professor of the latter system once said, in the course of a lecture delivered before the Shorthand Writers Association, "I have seen so much shorthand—and very difficult work too—done, and well done, by writers of each of the four or five 'popular systems' as they are called—and so many cases of downright failure in connection with all, that if any general conclusion were to be deduced from such extreme instances, the logical result would be, that all systems were equally good and equally bad."

The editor of the present work is Mr. Thomas Gurney, who, with his brother, Mr. Joseph Gurney, is shorthand writer to the Houses of Lords and Commons. These gentlemen are the sons of the late Mr. W. B. Gurney, who again was the son of Mr. Thomas Gurney, who received the appointment more than a century ago, and in whose family it has remained ever since. The Messrs. Gurney employ a very large staff, who, of course, write the shorthand taught in the little treatise before us.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S INN.

Jan. 28.—Re Brown.

Application to rescind order for examination of witnesses—Practice.

Reed moved for a rule calling upon the trustee under a deed of assignment executed by Peter Brown to show cause why an order which he had obtained for the examination of two witnesses resident at Bradford should not be rescinded. The matter had been referred to the Court by Mr. Registrar Murray.

It appeared from the affidavit used in support of the motion, that in August, 1867, Peter Brown, the debtor, commenced an action in the Court of Common Pleas, against the Bradford Carpet Company, to recover a sum of £371. Several pleas were pleaded in the action, and in October, 1868, the debtor, being in difficulties, executed a deed of assignment to a trustee for the benefit of creditors, which was duly registered in the following month under the 192nd section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. On the 3rd of December, 1868, Mr. Justice Brett made an order that the trustee under the deed should within four days give security for the defendant's costs, and that in the meantime all further proceedings should be stayed. The trustee, it was alleged, having failed to comply with this order, applied in November last, on affidavit, to the London Court of Bankruptcy for an order for the examination of witnesses, which he obtained in due course; and the ground of the present application was that the fact of the learned judge having ordered the trustee to find security had been suppressed. It was contended that the case came within the principle of Re Gabrielli (16 W. R. 957), where an order similar to that now asked for was made.

The CHIEF JUDGE granted a rule, but intimated at the same time that the object of the examination of witnesses in Re Gabrielli was to upset the deed, and in this case it might be argued by the trustee, that although his common law action was stayed, he had a full right to proceed in the Court of Bankruptcy.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7—Costs.

Nixon and Another v. Rigg.

This was an adjourned debtor's summons under the new law. The case was noticed ante p. 279, and the Chief Judge had granted time to the defendant to find security for the amount claimed and costs. It was now stated that the balance of the plaintiffs' claim had been paid to them, and the only question remaining was whether (the summons being dismissed) they were entitled to their costs.

Bagley, for the plaintiffs.

R. Griffiths, for the defendant.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after hearing arguments, asked on what possible ground could he refuse to give the plaintiffs their costs? It was owing solely to the course pursued by the debtor that the costs had been occasioned, and common sense and common justice demanded that he should pay them.

Jan. 29.—57th rule—Precedence of Counsel.

Mr. Lawrance, solicitor, applied in Re Belcher, appointed to be heard at 10.30, for an order to file a petition.

Reed, who was engaged in a case fixed for 11 o'clock, claimed (it being then a quarter past 11 o'clock) the right of precedence. He referred to the 57th rule.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that if there had been a regular paper of causes no doubt counsel would be entitled to precedence, but here one case had been fixed for 10.30, and the other for 11 o'clock, and no right of precedence could exist under the circumstances.

Re Belcher—Leave to file petition nunc pro tunc.

Mr. Lawrance, solicitor, proceeded with this case. It appeared that towards the end of December a petition was presented by a creditor for an adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor, but upon investigation of the debt it was found to arise upon a joint and several bond, and the petitioning creditor was one of four obligees. Mr. Commissioner Winslow gave leave to amend, and the solicitor's clerk then took away the file of proceedings—a most improper course no doubt—for the purpose of amending the petition. This having been done he again presented the petition to the Chief Registrar, who declined to receive it without the leave of the Court. He (Mr. Lawrance) now applied to file the petition nunc pro tunc.

Mr. Aldridge, solicitor, for the Chief Registrar, submitted to the order of the Court.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that nothing could be more improper than the conduct of the clerk. Everything seemed to be regular until he took away the file of proceedings, which he clearly had no right to do, and his Lordship understood that the petition was duly filed in court under the old Act, and that leave to amend had been given. An order would be given to file the petition nunc pro tunc, but inasmuch as the Chief Registrar had been put to the expense of coming here his costs must be paid. Order accordingly.

Shaw and Others v. Michael.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7—Rule 159—Practice.

This was a debtor's summons under the 7th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The creditor claimed £432 principal and interest as the indorsee of a bill of exchange dated in April, 1869, at six months, drawn by the debtor.

The debtor wholly disputed the claim, alleging as a defence that due notice had not been given of the dishonour of the bill, and the parties desire an issue. Mr. J. W.

Michael, a son of the debtor, having been examined, and the Chief Judge having overruled objections to the particulars of demand and the affidavit of the debtor filed in opposition.

Mr. Ince, solicitor, for the creditor, asked that security should be given by the debtor for the amount claimed.

Reed, for the debtor, contended that if a debtor was required to give security before trial, the practice might lead to much oppression.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that the creditor was entitled to ask for security. There seemed to be a fair question for trial between the parties, and if the cause was decided in the debtor's favour he could then ask that the summons be dismissed, but he must give security for debt and costs. The bond would be for the amount claimed, and £30 for costs, and upon that being given the proceedings would be stayed. The issue, reduced into writing, would form the record, and his Lordship added, "We will try the question as well as we can manage to do it."

Jan. 31.—Re Brown.

Bagley showed cause against the rule obtained in this case (vide supra).

Reed, in support of the rule.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that the affidavit used in support of the application to examine witnesses was sufficiently full in all respects to justify the order made upon it, and discharged the rule with costs.

Feb. 1.—Langmead v. Earley.

This was an adjourned debtor's summons, the creditor, a builder and decorator, claiming £80 for work and labour done, and materials provided. The claim was disputed except as to £40, and the debtor desired to have the case tried by a jury.

Bagley, for the creditor, and Reed, for the debtor.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after hearing the evidence of the debtor, said he must find security for the amount claimed.

Reed, contended that this would be a great hardship on the debtor, for the creditor had only to claim a large sum to compel his debtor to find security.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—We must deal with each particular case as it arises. The question here is a very simple one—is there a contract or not? The debtor desires to have the question tried, and he must find security. I make this order without giving any opinion upon the matter in dispute between the parties.

Solicitors for the creditor, East & Finston.

Solicitors for the debtor, G. O. Nash.

Feb. 3.—The CHIEF JUDGE has intimated that for the present, notwithstanding the Chancery vacations, he will sit daily at half-past ten.

Mr. Munns, solicitor, of the firm of Lewis, Munns, Nunn, & Longden, made reference to the comparatively early hour at which the sittings were fixed, and said it would be much more convenient to his branch of the profession if his Lordship would sit later.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that, in the Courts of Chancery, solicitors were bound to attend at ten o'clock, and he did not see any necessity for an alteration.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. ROBERT G. WYNDHAM HERBERT, barrister-at-law, has recently been appointed Assistant Under-Secretary at the Colonial Office, in succession to Sir F. Sandford, who has become Secretary to the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, in the place of Mr. Ralph Lingen, C.B. Mr. Herbert was educated at Eton, and afterwards at Balliol College, Oxford, of which society he was elected a scholar in 1849. In 1851 he gained the Hertford scholarship, and became Ireland scholar in 1852; in the same year he received the prize for Latin verse. In 1854 he obtained the Eldon scholarship, and was elected a fellow of All Souls. In the following year he received the appointment of Private Secretary to Mr. Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in April, 1858. In 1859 he was appointed Colonial Secretary of Queensland. On his return home, he became Assistant Secretary in the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, from which he has just been transferred to the Colonial Office.

Mr. W. R. MALCOLM, barrister-at-law, of Lincoln's-inn, has been appointed Assistant-Secretary to the Railway Department of the Board of Trade, vacant by the nomination of Mr. R. G. W. Herbert to be Assistant Under-Secretary at the Colonial Office. Mr. Malcolm was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1842; he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in November, 1865, and has practised as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer. Latterly he has been employed under Mr. Thring, the Parliamentary draughtsman, in drawing up various Government bills for the Board of Trade, and among others the Merchant Shipping Bill.

Mr. WILLIAM LISLE, solicitor, of Durham, has been elected clerk to the Durham Board of Guardians, in succession to the late Mr. Richard Thompson, and his appointment has been approved by the Poor Law Board. Mr. Lisle was certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1859, and was formerly in partnership with Mr. Thompson, the deceased clerk.

Mr. HENRY WATSON PARKER, solicitor, of the Rectory House, St. Michael's-alley, Cornhill, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. EDWIN BEDFORD, solicitor, of Haberdashers' Hall, City, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths in the Common Law Courts.

Mr. GEORGE BRAXTON ALDRIDGE, solicitor, of Poole, Dorsetshire, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking affidavits in the Common Law Courts.

Mr. CHARLES DUFFELL FAULKNER, solicitor, of Deddington, Oxfordshire, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women, in and for the county of Oxford.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

JOHN MILLER.—We shall notice the case you mention.

THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—The fourteenth question put by the Judicature Commissioners is as follows:—"Would it be convenient if several county court circuits were consolidated, so as to form a circuit within which the judges would not be attached to a particular court, but would take their several courts in rotation, and arrange for the trial of the more important business at some central place or places?" This question, it will be seen, involves the consideration of two distinct matters: first, whether it be desirable for the judges to sit interchangeably or by rotation in the several courts of a large district; and next, whether it be wise to extend to the county court system the principle of centralisation. I will deal with these matters in their order, and first, with the supposed plan of consolidating the circuits.

In my opinion any such plan would be open to insuperable objections. The efficient working of every county court mainly depends on the intimate relationship which subsists between the judge and the several registrars of his circuit, and on the salutary control which he exercises over the practice and procedure of his different courts. He fixes the days of sitting so as best to suit the convenience of all parties; he determines the number of complaints to be inserted in each day's list, and the number of summonses returnable at the same hour; he settles the form of summons and of particulars of claim which in his judgment is sufficiently explicit; he decides on the frame of the judge's note-book most agreeable to himself; and in a variety of other little matters, unnecessary to enumerate, he regulates or sanctions the mode of proceeding which his experience tells him is most conducive to the despatch of business and the orderly administration of justice. All this works smoothly and well so long as each registrar has but one judge to consult, but place him in communication with four or five judges, and the proverbial difficulty of serving two masters will be illustrated in a very aggravated form. The days of sitting that would suit one judge might be extremely inconvenient to another. A quick man can dispose of a hundred causes while a slow man is cautiously dealing with fifty. A robust and a zealous judge may like to sit eight hours a day, while a delicate man cannot and an idle man will not sit consecutively for more than five hours. Again, one judge will be content with a summons against "Smith, of Brighton," or "Jones, of Conway," but another, more scrupulous, will require such a description of the defendant, and of his address, as will serve to identify him; and while a general claim for "goods sold" will pass muster as sufficient particulars before some judges, others will not be satisfied unless the nature of the goods and the dates of sale be also given. So there are some few judges—and I am of the number—who enter every judgment carefully in a note-book, and thus, by checking the registrar's record of proceedings, reduce to a minimum the chance of any erroneous entry on his part. Others, however, require no note-book whatever, and satisfied with a sheet of blotting paper on which to dot their hieroglyphic notes, they would not use a book, even if it were placed before them. How, in the instances just put—and the number of illustrations might be largely increased,—would the puzzled registrar, who for the first time found himself associated with a judicial plurality, know how to act? Would he vary the practice of the court to suit the varying tastes of his superiors "by rotation," or would he—as in the sacred apothegm—"hold to the one and despise the others"?

Another obvious evil that would arise from the consolidation of county court circuits is that the judges—coming as they would do only occasionally into each district—would have no opportunity of learning the characters of the practitioners, the agents, and the habitual litigants of the several courts. The importance of knowledge on this subject it is difficult to over-estimate, as on it depends not only the accurate, but—what is of almost equal importance when a large amount of business must be got through—the speedy discovery of truth. There are men who constantly attend my court, whether as advocates, or agents, or suitors, or witnesses, on whose word I can implicitly rely; there are others—plausible till found out—who require constant watching with more or less care according to the temptation to which they may be exposed. It is not until after considerable experience of their conduct that any judge, however acute, can discriminate safely between these two classes of persons; yet, until such discrimination can be made, much injustice must be done, or, at the best, much time must be wasted in hearing needless corroborative testimony.

A third objection to the suggested plan is, that it would destroy all hope of anything like uniformity of decision in any court or district. It is a humiliating avowal, but nevertheless true, that on many questions of constant recurrence, especially on those connected with the law of landlord and tenant, and of master and servant, the opinions of the judges vary in a very remarkable degree. I remember some years back my late friend Mr. Adolphus strove to ascertain on what principle his learned brethren decided cases where a servant, who had been dismissed for misconduct, or had left his place without notice, brought an action for wages. With this view he sent a circular query to several of the metropolitan judges, and the first five answers, as he told me, all differed materially as to the modus decidendi. The result, as might be expected, rather fostered a habit of self-reliance than one of profound respect for the sentiments of his fellows; and I believe he thenceforth was content to deal with matters before him, relying solely on his own legal knowledge and good sense. Now, although it is an undoubted blemish in our administration of justice that such discrepancies in the interpretation of the law should exist, and it would be very desirable, if possible, that four inconsistent rules of Law should not be recognised in Marylebone and Lambeth, Clerkenwell and Shoreditch—such being rather a vulgar parody on the classical "alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis"; yet still the inconvenience caused by the want of uniformity in the decisions of different courts is as nothing compared to what it would be if different laws were promulgated at different times from one and the same court. In such an event how could the practitioners advise their clients as to the probabilities of success, and when could the issuing clerks feel safe in warning too eager plaintiffs against almost certain defeat? No cause would be so good as to give confidence to the timid, no cause so bad as to lead the bold to despair. The wisdom of one judge would be neutralised by the unwisdom of his successor, and the law as administered throughout the circuit would become a lottery and a laughing-stock. I need only further observe, with respect to the suggested plan, that, without producing any one practical advantage as the slightest set-off to the evils I have already enumerated, it would be sure to increase very considerably the demands of the judges for travelling expenses, and, unless I am strangely misinformed, the demands on that head are already sufficiently high.

The idea of arranging "for the trial of the more important business at some central place or places" is one so obviously objectionable that I feel I can safely dispose of it in a very few words. The two grand objects aimed at by the county court system were, first, to make justice cheap, and next, to bring it home to the poor man's door. It was a noble scheme in which the judges were made to play the useful rather than the dignified part of legal tallymen. But the proposal in question would set this scheme entirely at naught. It would enormously swell the costs of litigation; it would as largely add to the trouble of suitors and witnesses; and it would cause a cruel waste of time. No doubt it might find favour with a few infirm judges and with some selfish lawyers, but so far as the real interests of the public are concerned it would be a prodigious blunder. Besides, who could decide upon what constituted "important business," and what time would there be for making "arrangements" as to the change of venue?

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

INSURANCE COMPANIES AND THEIR AMALGAMATIONS.

Sir,—The recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the Family Endowment case, 18 W. R. 266, appears to me to leave untouched a class of cases, representing the vast majority of the claims against the amalgamated companies. What is settled by the above case (subject, of course, to the result of an appeal to the House of Lords) is, that where a policy-holder has, prior to the amalgamation, actually earned the fruits of his policy, without any further act to be done by him to secure them, his claim, being consummate, as against his insurers, cannot be repudiated by them, merely by the fact of his having passed to another company receipt for the annual payments due to the former. In other words, that nothing short of acceptance by the creditor of the security of another company, in lieu of the previous liability, can absolve the original insurers; and that the giving receipts to the new company is not sufficient evidence of such transfer. I submit that the case of the holders of policies running at the time of amalgamation widely differs. The essential condition on which the subsistence of a policy depends is the periodical payment of the premiums to the insurers; and, accordingly, it will be incumbent on this class of policy-holders, in order to keep alive their claims on the old companies, to show that they have regularly paid their premiums to the present time actually or constructively. Some policy holders have, I believe, prudently insisted on taking their periodical receipts, in the name of the original insurers; but, in the greater number of instances, even where no new policy has been issued by the purchasing company, the receipts purport to be issued by the latter, simply ignoring the existence of the former. The only ground on which such payments could be held to suffice is that of agency. But agency, if not rebutted by the form of the receipt itself, can only exist, provided it be within the legitimate scope of the old company; and this turns upon the question of the validity of the amalgamation itself. Now it is settled by the case of Clinch v. Financial Corporation, L. R. 5 Eq. 450, on appeal, 17 W. R. 85, that unless provided for by the articles of the company, or assented to by all the shareholders, an amalgamation, whereby the property of one company is handed over to another is ultra vires, and not voidable only, but simply void; and, consequently, that all arrangements founded thereon are equally void. It follows that the old company had no power to constitute the new its agent to receive the premiums on its behalf; and the holders of policies who dealt with the new company, in fact, entered therewith into a new contract, on the basis of the old, which they abandoned. It may be said that this doctrine would entail great hardship on the policyholder; and so it might, if he could be forced to exchange one security for another without a voice in the matter. But he may, if he please, elect to keep his old security alive by refusing to accept a receipt in the name of the new company; or he may sue the old company for breach of contract, in case of an express refusal to accept the premiums; or he can, as was done in the case of Aldebert v. Leaf, 12 W. R. 462, restrain the old company from parting with their assets, at all events without setting apart a fund to answer his future claim. I submit, sir, these few reasons for holding, as I do, a strong opinion that even though many of the companies which have been incorporated with the Albert, may have to be wound up in conformity with the recent decision, the claims capable of being substantiated against them are comparatively few, provided the important question to which I have alluded be put in a proper train for decision.

A BARRISTER.

Jan. 28, 1870.

P.S.—Since writing the foregoing, the very point has come for decision before Vice-Chancellor Malins, on last Saturday, In re National Provident Life Assurance Society, Ex parte Kettle and Fleming, upon a motion for a winding-up order, at the suit of a policyholder. As there was a further petition at the suit of an annuitant, his Honour, acting on the authority of Pott's case, made an order on the latter; but in making no rule on the former, he intimated a decided opinion that the petitioners had discharged the liability of the old company, and accepted a fresh security in lieu thereof by paying his premiums to and taking receipts from the new. I submit that the lapse of the former contract, by non-payment of premium, furnishes even a more fatal objection to the claim of the policyholder against his original insurers.

THE GREAT STAMP QUESTION.

Sir,—For the information of the profession we beg to enclose a copy of a letter we have received from the Solicitor of Inland Revenue respecting the penalties on stamping deeds which may now, after the decision in Boulton's case, be held to be insufficiently stamped.

OLIVER & BOTTERELL,
Solicitors' Department,
Somerset House, London, W.C.
31st January, 1870.

Gentlemen,—In reply to your letter of the 28th inst., I beg to say that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have determined not to exact any penalties on the re-stamping of deeds shown to be insufficiently stamped by the recent decision of the Court of Exchequer in Boulton's case, and which are brought to be stamped within a reasonable time after that decision. Where a deed is more than twelve months old, there must be, to satisfy the law, a formal payment of the penalty; but care will be taken to render the transaction so formal as to be no practical inconvenience to the public.—I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

W. H. MELVILL,
Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Messrs. Oliver & Botterell, Solicitors, Sunderland.

BARRISTERS AND ATTORNEYS.

Sir,—Your correspondent, "A Solicitor," seems to have a singular facility for mistaking the point at issue. I never advanced nor intended to advance any "argument in favour of the existing system," sound or unsound. I expressed an opinion in favour of that system, but I am not conceited enough to suppose that to be an argument. The object of my letter was merely to point out, first, that "A Solicitor," "A Country Attorney" and other correspondents, who wrote as if the rule in question was one invented by the bar for the purpose of keeping down the attorneys, had missed or avoided the true merits of the case; and secondly, that taking their own ground the present distinction did not work so exclusively in favour of the bar as they seemed to suppose, nay that, in one very important particular it inflicted considerable injury on the bar for the benefit of the attorney. These gentlemen, and not the suitors or the public, have had the benefit of the money lost by the junior bar in the manner I mentioned.

I may add that as far as I can learn of the working of the system prevailing in Canada, it practically makes the working partner entirely dependent for success on the merits of the speaking partner, and I question whether your correspondents could desire to bring about a similar state of things here.

On the merits of the proposed change I am quite satisfied with the arguments which have from time to time appeared in your leading columns, to which I did not, and do not, propose to add anything of my own.

Lincoln's-inn, January 29.

SHEARMAN AND REDFIELD ON NEGLIGENCE.

Sir,—It is probably never very wise for an author to answer a critic; and this letter may be no exception to the rule. Nevertheless, there is one point in your extended notice of "Shearman & Redfield on Negligence" (published Dec. 11, 1869), which implies a reproach too severe to be borne in silence; and that is, the charge that the book has "no principle of arrangement, except perhaps that of putting the more important propositions before those that are less so," and has "no attempt whatever at an analysis of the subject."

I do not know of any complaint to which either of the authors, and especially Mr. Shearman, could be more sensitive, since he has justly earned a reputation among his professional brethren for power in that very direction. Indeed it so happens that the very portion of the Civil Code of New York, which you specially commended for its logical arrangement (the division on Obligations), was the part of which Mr. Shearman, as secretary to the Code Commission, laid out the plan. This, of course, is no proof that he has succeeded equally well in dealing with a new subject, but may excuse us for replying to the charge.

To come to the point, it seems to me clear that your critic has made a mistake in thinking that the book had no analytical plan, however wrong that plan might be. The system adopted was to lay down, first, the rules which were capable of application to all cases of negligence and all persons. Second, rules applicable to all cases of negligence, but only to certain classes of persons. And, third, the rules applicable only to particular cases or classes of cases. Under this third division, an alphabetical arrangement was adopted for the obvious reason that the various subjects were wholly disconnected, and were not susceptible of any other classification one-tenth part as convenient or intelligible to the reader.

- | | |
|--|--------------------------------|
| I.—Negligence generally considered. | 1. Negligence defined. |
| | 2. Degrees of negligence. |
| | 3. Contributory negligence. |
| II.—Who may be liable for negligence, and to whom. | 1. Parties generally. |
| | 2. Master and servant. |
| | 3. Municipal corporations. |
| | 4. Public officers. |
| III.—Particular cases of negligence | 1. Animals (mismanagement of). |
| | 2. Attorneys (inaccuracy of). |
| | 3. Bankers. |
| | 4. Bridges, &c., &c. |

IV.—Damages recoverable in each of these cases.

Find what fault you will with this plan, but do not say that there is no plan.

Your critic suggests that the true way to frame such a book would be to state—first the duty, then the breach, and then the damage. I cannot imagine how such a basis could be adopted without plunging in medias res at once, and repeating legal propositions over and over again. At short intervals, extending over three years, Mr. Shearman and myself laboured to devise and improve the classification of our subjects, and, while we are reasonably modest, we cannot see that any improvement has yet been suggested.

AMASA A. REDFIELD.

20, Nassau-street, New York, Jan. 6. 1870.

[Our objection was, that the work was arranged on a faulty plan rather than that it was arranged on none; and this, we believe, will appear from a perusal of our critique in its entirety. We certainly considered that the work was not based upon any logical principle or analysis of the subject; we arrived at this conclusion after a careful examination, and we cannot consider that any such principle or analysis is disclosed in the work itself. Mr. Redfield's letter now shows what was the actual intention of the authors as to arrangement, and we hope that by directing their attention to this matter we have afforded them a hint which may prove useful in the preparation of a second edition. The analysis now given is a great improvement upon the table of contents given in the work, from which it appears to us to vary considerably. We still fail to see why "master and servant" "municipal corporations" and "public officers" do not fairly come under the head of Particular Cases of Negligence, and think, as we said before, that Mr. Shearman and Mr. Redfield placed them before the other cases simply because they were more important. We shall be glad to welcome the second edition.—Ed. S.J.

AN APPEAL.

Sir,—May I be permitted through the medium of your influential Journal to make an appeal to your affluent readers in connection with the following very painful case?

The widow of a solicitor, who, in his lifetime, was widely-known and respected, is now in the most straitened circumstances.

One of her daughters has, during the greater part of last year, been afflicted with a most serious illness, involving an amount of expenditure which has completely exhausted her means.

It has been found necessary to remove the invalid to the West-end of London, to be under the immediate care of eminent physicians. To carry this out means are needed, and it is earnestly hoped that this appeal may not be in vain.

W. H. LUSIGNAN,

Lecturer of All Hallows, and Chairman of the Ladies' Home, Queen-square.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received for the widow, L. L., by Messrs. Ransom & Bouverie, Pall-mall, and by the London and County Bank, Lombard-street.

OBITUARY.

MR. EDWARD EVERETT.

Mr. Edward Everett, of Harnham Cliff, near Salisbury, late judge of the Salisbury County Court, died at Clifton on the 29th of January, in the 71st year of his age. Mr. Everett was the fourth son of the late Joseph Everett, Esq., a banker of Salisbury, by Tabitha Martha, his wife. He was born in 1798, and was educated at Winchester School, whence he proceeded to Balliol College, Oxford, and graduated in honours. In May, 1824, he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, and for some time practised as a conveyancer at Salisbury. He formerly filled the office of judge of the Court of Requests in Salisbury, established under the provisions of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 84, and was appointed the first judge of the County Court for the Salisbury district (Circuit No. 55) in the year 1846. This office he continued to hold till the end of 1867, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Mr. T. E. P. Lefroy, the present judge. Mr. Everett was a justice of the peace for Wiltshire. He married, on the 8th September, 1846, Emma, only daughter of William Fowle, Esq., of Chute Lodge, Wilts.

MR. RICHARD BADHAM.

This gentleman, an old solicitor, of Bromyard, Herefordshire, died there on the 24th January, in the eightieth year of his age. He was a certificated as a solicitor in Trinity Term, 1812, and was perpetual commissioner for Worcestershire and Herefordshire, and also a commissioner to administer oaths and for taking affidavits.

MR. J. W. MAYSON.

The death of Mr. John Walker Mayson, solicitor, of North Shields and of Newcastle-on-Tyne, occurred on the 27th January, at his residence, Northumberland-square, North Shields. Mr. Mayson, who was an alderman of Tynemouth, was certificated in Hilary Term, 1829, and was a member of the Newcastle firm of Laws, Glynn, & Mayson. In 1854 he was elected Mayor of Tynemouth, and in the following year he acted as magistrate. He continued to act as an alderman of the borough up to the time of his death, though he latterly practised chiefly at Newcastle.

MR. E. R. BUTLER.

Mr. Edward Robert Butler, solicitor, of Furnival's-inn, Holborn (also of Cromwell Hall, Finchley, and Medina-villas, Brighton), died on the 25th of January. He was certificated in Hilary Term, 1823, and had been for many years established at Furnival's-inn.

MR. FRANK COLLINS.

Mr. Frank Collins, solicitor, expired on the 28th January, at Guildford-street, London, at the early age of twenty-nine years. The deceased gentleman was the last surviving son of Mr. W. I. S. Collins, of Williton, Somerset, and formerly of Exeter.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the Board of Directors was held at the Law Institution, London, on Wednesday last, the 2nd inst. Mr. Henry Thomas Young in the chair.

The other directors present were:—Messrs. Hedger, Rickman, Sidney Smith, and Torr. Mr. Eiffe, secretary.

A sum of £25 was granted for the relief of three necessitous widows of non-members. Four new annual members were admitted to the association, and other business transacted.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on the 1st inst., Mr. E. C. Harvie in the chair, upon the motion of Mr. Appleton, the society repealed the rule imposing a fine upon ordinary members of less than three years standing in case of their absence from the weekly meetings without giving notice to the secretary. The motion which was keenly contested was carried in the affirmative by seventeen votes to fourteen. Other business was also disposed of. The number of members present was thirty-five.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

LECTURES AND LAW CLASSES AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE UNDER THE CODE NAPOLEON.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

Most French lawyers are very proud of this code, which has certainly the merit of being so mathematically simple that everybody who can read is able to judge for himself, without the help of a solicitor, what things he may and may not do. Of late years, however, there has been a growing opinion amongst the liberal-minded and reforming portion of the French Bar that there is room for considerable improvement in the methods of procedure which the code lays down; and this opinion applies especially to the criminal procedure, which is both more intricate and more harassing in its effects than ours. France, as at present constituted, is divided for judicial purposes into tribunals of "first instance" and Imperial courts, there being of the former one for every arrondissement, and of the latter twenty-seven in the whole Empire. Above all is one Court of High Appeal, the Court de Cassation, which sits in Paris. In civil cases a man can have recourse successively to five jurisdictions. First he can apply to the justice of the peace of his canton, who has power to adjudicate as to all sums not exceeding a hundred francs; next he can appeal to the tribunal of his arrondissement; after that he may be sent to the Cour Impériale of the district; then if he wishes it, to the Court of Cassation, and finally to the Council of State, which has power—though it seldom exercises it—to hear his case over again if he fancies himself maliciously wronged by one of his judges. There is no jury in civil cases. The trials in “first instance” take place before three judges; in the Imperial Courts before five or seven; in the Court of Cassation before twelve. In all causes the Procureur-Imperial intervenes either for the plaintiff or defendant as he thinks right, and it is very rare indeed that his intervention does not sway the verdict. In criminal cases the condemned man has three appeals—that is, to the court of the arrondissement, the Imperial Court, and the Court of Cassation: after these all that remains is the recours en grâce, which the counsel of a prisoner under sentence of death or penal servitude transmits to the Sovereign through the Minister of Justice. In the country, when a peasant commits a small misdemeanour, he is summoned before the justice of the peace of the canton, who may punish him with not more than two days’ imprisonment, or with a fine not exceeding a hundred francs. At Paris it is the Tribunal of Simple Police which takes cognisance of these minor offences; and any stranger curious to see justice expeditiously administered would do well to pay a visit to this tribunal, where from ten in the morning to three in the afternoon cabmen, costermongers, and street-boys defile in an unbroken procession to answer for peccadilloes known as delits de voirie—i.e., breaches of peace and municipal regulations. In the case of offences of a serious nature it is no longer the juge de paix or the Tribunal of Simple Police to whom the accused is deferred, but to the Procureur-Imperial. For example, when an indictable offence has been committed the first person to be informed of it—if the delinquent have not been arrested on the spot—is the Commissaire de Police, with whom the complaint is lodged. There are eighty of these commissaires in Paris, and their functions are rather more extensive than those of English inspectors of police, for they may at their discretion liberate prisoners who are simply charged with drunkenness or riotous conduct. Four times a day the commissaires send reports to the Prefecture de Police, whence all complaints are directly forwarded to the Procureur-Imperial, or public prosecutor, who immediately issues against the parties accused either a summons (mandat de comparution) or a warrant (mandat d’amener). It needs an incredible amount of tact and judgment to discharge the functions of public prosecutor with equity; but it cannot be said that, as a rule, the imperial procureurs come up to the desired standard. They are a very ill-paid class. Their salaries vary from £60 a-year in country districts to £240 a-year in large towns; and even the procureurs-general, or public prosecutors-in-chief, of whom there are but 28 in the whole empire, receive only £640. These emoluments are too small to tempt men who have the slightest chance of making their way at the bar, and the Government is obliged to select from among those who, however honest and painstaking they may be, are, at best, lawyers of quite second-rate capacity. The Procureur-Imperial and his deputies sit every day and divide the business between them. When a defendant appears to answer a summons, or comes up in custody under warrant, his examination is conducted in strict privacy; and the Procureur, who is often overdone with work, seldom takes more than a few minutes in deciding whether there are grounds for a prosecution or not. If the charge seems a frivolous one, or if the prima facie evidence be insufficient, he may at once dismiss the case; in the contrary event he hands over the inculpé to the examining magistrate, or juge d’instruction, who either liberates the defendant on bail (though this is very rarely done) or orders his provisory incarceration under a mandat de depot. We may remark that great latitude is always allowed by French magistrates towards journalists charged with press offences, and towards men in good social position indicted for such misdemeanours as duelling, assault, or rioting. We may add, too, that although in press prosecutions the printer of a paper is generally indicted with the editor, and sentenced to a month or two of confinement, it is not customary for the Procureur to insist upon the carrying out of the sentence. There are printers in Paris who, during the last twenty years, have had two or three years of imprisonment meted out to them in instalments, and who yet have never slept a single night in gaol.

So much has been already written both in English and foreign papers concerning the slow-torture system to which French justice has recourse in order to screw confessions out of prisoners that we will say nothing more on the subject, further than to point out how immense is the discretionary power confided to a juge d’instruction. All that goes on in his study is a profound mystery to the outer world. There is no one to control his actions, and, if it suits him to hush up a case, he may do so with perfect safety, without having anything unpleasant in the way of newspaper comments to dread. Whether French examining magistrates ever do hush up cases where influence is brought to bear upon them from high quarters is another question; but the bare fact that they should be able to abuse these powers with impunity sufficiently justifies the opinion of liberal Frenchmen that the functions of the juge d’instruction should be exercised openly, as in England. After a probationary term, which varies according to the more or less difficulty there may be in extracting the truth from him, a prisoner is either committed straightway to take his trial before the Tribunal of Correctional Police, or, if the charge be one of felony, is sent back to prison to await the decision of the Chambre des Mises en Accusation, a sort of judicial grand jury, whose business it is to see whether the indictments are clear enough to warrant a committal to the Court of Assize. The Tribunal of Correctional Police sits all the year round; the Court of Assize holds two sessions a month in Paris, and four a year in the twenty-seven other Imperial courts. The difference between the two jurisdictions is that in the former the trial rests with three judges; whilst in the latter the prisoner is arraigned before a jury.

Most Englishmen who have visited Paris must have been to see the Correctional Tribunals, rendered famous by the numerous press trials of the Second Empire. They consist of two chambers, the sixth and seventh, both identical in appearance. There is a rich well-furnished look about them which one is not always accustomed to find in a court of justice. The paper on the wall is green, with large gold bees; all round the room runs a carved wainscoting of oak; to the right, on a pedestal, is a marble bust of the Emperor; to the left, on a fellow pedestal, a handsome clock; and at the end of the room, over the dais of the three judges, a life-size picture of the Saviour on the cross. On the right of the judges’ dais, which is warmly carpeted with a thick green rug, is the dock where the prisoner stands between two gendarmes; opposite it a low pulpit, with a comfortable arm-chair for the public prosecutor; down the centre of the court a sort of “fops’ alley,” with rows of seats on each side for the public, like the pews in a church. The trials in correctional police never last long. The judges adopt an aggressive tone in their questions, which indicates pretty plainly that their opinion as to the prisoner’s guilt is made up beforehand. The public prosecutor, on his side, never fails to observe that unless the accused can prove his innocence his culpability must be taken for granted, and so the trial generally ends in a condemnation, which may vary from one day’s to five years’ imprisonment.

In the Court of Assize the proceedings are altogether more formal, and allow a prisoner much better chance of an acquittal. The oath which the jury are made to swear is an extremely beautiful one, and it is impossible to hear it without feeling moved. Lifting up their hands one after another they declare that “without malice and without favour, without prejudice and without weakness, they will examine the evidence with an impartial desire to ascertain the truth, and convict or acquit as they shall consider just, on their honour and conscience as honest men.” There are three judges at the assize trials, as at those of the Police Correctionnelle, but the same reproach may be addressed to the former as to the latter, of always summing up dead against the prisoner. As a compensation, however, French juries are exceedingly jealous of their prerogatives, and not unfrequently acquit solely to assert their independence. The verdict is not rendered by “guilty” and “not guilty,” as in England, but by the answer “yes” or “no” to a long series of questions enumerated by the presiding judge. In cases of murder, with robbery, these questions sometimes amount to as many as fifty or sixty; for the indictment is made to include all the minor counts of aggravated assault, &c., so that if the prisoner be acquitted on the charge of murder, there shall be no need to begin a fresh trial to convict him of manslaughter.

In France it is with the jury that lies the prerogative of admitting “extenuating circumstances”; in Belgium it is with the judges. There is much to be said for both systems, the main objection to the French method being that juries often admit "extenuating circumstances," without any relation to the merits of the case, but simply because they object to capital punishment. Many a French murderer has owed his life to the fact of a tender-hearted jurymen having read M. Victor Hugo's "Dernier Jour d'un Condamné" or Beccaria's essay against the penalty of death.

COURT PAPERS.

COMMON PLEAS.

This Court will, on Saturday, the 5th, Monday, the 7th, Friday, the 11th, Saturday the 12th, and Monday, the 14th days of February, hold sittings, and will proceed first with the country new trials, and afterwards with the special paper; and will also hold a sitting on Wednesday, the 23rd February, for the purpose of delivering judgments.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

This Court will hold sittings on Tuesday, the 8th, Wednesday, the 9th, Thursday, the 10th, Friday, the 11th, Saturday, the 12th, and Monday, the 14th days of February, and will, at such sittings, proceed in disposing of the business then pending in the paper of new trials and in the special paper; and will also hold a sitting on Wednesday, the 23rd day of February, and will, at such sitting proceed in giving judgment in matters then standing for judgment.

A list of causes for trial at Manchester and Liverpool respectively, each day (except the first) will be exhibited in the corridor of the court and in the library.

Mr. J. L. Pulling, solicitor and Parliamentary agent, of Adelaide-place, London-bridge, and Mr. J. M. Chamberlain, solicitor, of Basinghall-street, have announced themselves as candidates for the vacant office of registrar of the City of London Court.

GENERAL ORDERS.

LUNACY.

Monday, Jan. 10, 1870.

I, William Page Baron Hatherley, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, entrusted by virtue of her Majesty the Queen's Sign Manual with the care and commitment of the custody of the persons and estates of persons found idiot, lunatic, or of unsound mind, do, with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable Sir George Markham Giffard, Lord Justice of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, also being entrusted as aforesaid, and by virtue and in exercise of the powers or authorities in this behalf vested in me by the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, and the Courts of Justice (Salaries and Funds) Act, 1869, and of every other power or authority in anywise enabling me in this behalf, order as follows:

1. The 29th of the General Orders in Lunacy, dated the 7th day of November, 1853, is hereby discharged, and the following Orders shall be deemed to be incorporated with the said General Orders in the place of the said Order hereby discharged, and shall be read and construed as part of such Orders, and the Interpretation Clause contained in such Orders shall be applicable to these Orders.

2. The Masters in Lunacy may from time to time, in such cases as they may think fit, certify that the whole or any part of the percentage payable under the Lunacy Regulation Act, 1853, is to be paid out of cash arising from dividends of the lunatic that may be standing to the credit of the matter of any lunacy, either generally or to any particular account, and when any such certificate is made, the amount certified thereby shall not be paid by means of stamps, but shall be carried over and transferred in manner hereinafter directed.

3. In each of the divisions of the Accountant-General's office there shall henceforth be kept an account, intitled "The Paymaster-General's Lunacy Percentage Account."

4. When any such certificate as hereinbefore mentioned is made, an office copy of such certificate is to be left at the office of the Accountant-General, and the Accountant-General is, by virtue of such certificate when so left, out of such cash as is mentioned in the 2nd of these Orders, to carry over the amount mentioned in such certificate from the credit of the account in such certificate in that behalf mentioned to the credit of the Paymaster-General's Lunacy Percentage Account, in that division of his office in which the account is kept, to the credit of which such cash shall be standing, and any orders made and to be made in any such matters respectively are to be subject to this Order, and to be acted upon by the Accountant-General accordingly.

5. As soon as conveniently may be after the 31st day of January, the 30th day of April, the 31st day of July, and the 31st day of October in each year, upon receiving from the Paymaster-General's office a direction to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to credit the account in their books of her Majesty's Paymaster-General "cash account" with the amount of cash standing on those days respectively on the credit of the said account, in each of the divisions of the Accountant-General's office, intitled "The Paymaster-General's Lunacy Percentage Account," the Accountant-General shall, by certificate under his hand, direct the Governor and Company of the said Bank to transfer from his account the amount so expressed in such direction to such cash account of the Paymaster-General accordingly, and such certificate of the Accountant-General shall be a good and sufficient authority to the said Bank to write off the amount therein mentioned from the account of the Accountant-General, and to carry it to the account of the Paymaster-General "cash account" as aforesaid, without any further order of the Court; and upon receiving from the said Bank a certificate that such transfer from the account of the Accountant-General to the account of the Paymaster-General has been effected, the Accountant-General is to cause the amount so transferred to be placed to the debit of the proper account in his books.

6. These orders shall take effect from the 11th day of January, 1870, and order 2 shall be deemed to operate as from the 1st day of October last, except so far as relates to such percentage (if any) as may since that day have been paid by means of stamps.

HATHERLEY, C.
G. M. GIFFARD, L.J.

LEGACY AND SUCCESSION DUTY.

Monday, Jan. 10, 1870.

The Right Honourable William Page Baron Hatherley, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, doth hereby, in pursuance and execution of all powers and authorities enabling him in that behalf, order and direct in manner following:

1. Every decree or order whereby it is intended to provide for payment out of a fund in court of any duty payable to the revenue under the Acts relating to legacy or succession duty, shall direct that the amount of such duty shall (upon such requisition as hereinafter mentioned) be transferred in manner hereinafter provided to the account of the public moneys of the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue, at the Bank of England.

2. When any decree or order containing any such direction as last aforesaid shall have been left at the office of the Accountant-General for the purpose of having such direction carried into effect, the Accountant-General, upon receiving from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a requisition showing the amount at which such duty has been assessed, and requesting the transfer thereof to the Revenue shall by certificate under his hand direct the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to transfer the amount of such duty from his account to the account of the public moneys of the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue at the Bank of England.

3. Such certificate as last aforesaid shall be a sufficient authority to the said bank to write off the amount therein mentioned from the account of the Accountant-General, and to place it to the account of the public moneys of the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue.

4. The Accountant-General, upon receiving from the said bank a certificate that such transfer as aforesaid from his account to the account of the public moneys of the Receiver-General of Inland Revenue has been effected, shall cause the amount so transferred to be placed to the debit of the proper account in his books.

5. This Order shall be read and construed as part of the Consolidated General Orders of the Court, and the interpretation clause in those Orders contained shall apply to this Order.

6. This Order shall come into operation on the 11th day of this present month of January, 1870.

HATHERLEY, C.

FEES OF TAXATION WHEN COSTS ARE PAYABLE OUT OF A FUND IN COURT.

Monday, Jan. 17, 1870.

The Right Honourable William Page Baron Hatherley, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice, consent, and assistance of the Right Honourable John Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir George Markham Giffard, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir Richard Malins, and the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Milbourne James, doth hereby, in exercise of the power given to him by the Courts of Justice (Salaries and Funds) Act, 1869, and of all other powers and authorities enabling him in that behalf, order and direct in manner following:—

1. Rule 8 of the 39th of the Consolidated General Orders, and the 8th of the General Orders of the 25th day of October, 1852, are hereby abrogated, and the following rules shall be deemed to be incorporated with the said Consolidated Orders, in the place of the said rule, and shall be read as part of such Orders, and the interpretation clause in such Orders contained shall apply to these rules.

2. Where costs are directed to be paid out of a fund in Court, the fees of taxation shall not be payable by means of stamps, but shall be carried over and transferred in manner hereinafter provided, and to that intent the taxing-master shall in such cases certify the amount of such fees.

3. In each of the divisions of the Accountant-General's office, an account shall from henceforth be kept, intitled "The Paymaster-General's Fees of Taxation Account"; and when any such certificate as is mentioned in the preceding rule is left at the office of the Accountant-General to be acted on, the amount of fees certified thereby shall be carried over from the fund out of which the costs are directed to be paid to the last-mentioned account in that division of the Accountant-General's office in which the account to the credit of which such fund shall be standing is kept.

4. As soon as conveniently may be after the 31st day of January, the 30th day of April, the 31st day of July, and the 31st day of October in each year, upon receiving from the Paymaster-General's office a direction to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to credit the account in their books of her Majesty's Paymaster-General "Cash Account," with the amount of cash standing on those days respectively on the credit of the said account in each of the divisions of the Accountant-General's office, intitled "The Paymaster-General's Fees of Taxation Account," the Accountant-General shall, by certificate under his hand, direct the Governor and Company of the said Bank to transfer from his account the amount so expressed in such direction to such cash account of the Paymaster-General accordingly, and such certificate of the Accountant-General shall be a good and sufficient authority to the said Bank to write off the amount therein mentioned from the account of the Accountant-General, and to place it to the account of the Paymaster-General "Cash Account" as aforesaid, without any further order of this Court, and upon receiving from the said Bank a certificate that such transfer from the account of the Accountant-General to the account of the Paymaster-General has been effected, the Accountant-General is to cause the amount so transferred to be placed to the debit of the proper account in his books.

5. This order shall come into operation on the 21st day of January, 1870, and rule 2 shall be deemed to take effect as from the 1st day of October last, except as regards such fees of taxation (if any) as may have been paid by means of stamps since that day.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

All the markets have been more or less dull this week. Mining investments have had an exceptional activity; telegraph shares continue to command high prices, and numerous new schemes of communication are bruited on every side. Great Western Stock, which had been steadily rising for many months, had a relapse this week, attributable probably to the realisations of the successful speculators. Erie shares have improved, on reports that recent steps taken by shareholders for their own protection are successfully maturing.

The general meeting of proprietors of the London and County Bank was held to-day, when the directors' report was adopted, and a dividend of 6 per cent. for the half-year, with a bonus of 2½ per cent., was declared, leaving a balance of £8,895 17s. 5d. to be carried forward. The net profits of the half-year were £87,669 19s. 10d., to which was added the sum of £6,225 17s. 7d., which had been brought down from the previous report.

The prospectus is issued of the Calcutta and Singapore Telegraph Company (Limited), the capital of which is £600,000, in £10 shares. Penang and Malacca are to have intermediate stations.

The 46th annual meeting of the Law Life Assurance Society was held on Wednesday, when a dividend and bonus equivalent to 36 per cent. were declared.

A separate Commission of the Peace has been granted to the borough of Huddersfield.

The Irish papers state that on the assembling of Parliament a bill to assimilate the Bankruptcy Law of Ireland to that of England will be introduced by the Government.

Mr. William Wilcox, of Offord-road, Islington, clerk to a solicitor in Fenchurch-street, City, was recently found drowned at Brighton.

Mr. Bompas, solicitor to Reuter's Telegraph Company, has received a special acknowledgment of £2,000 for his services to the company during the recent negotiations with government for the transfer of the telegraphic wires.

It is stated that a member of the legal firm of Bircham, Dalrymple, & Drake, of Parliament-street, will be commissioned by the Erie Shareholders' Protection Society to proceed to America to take the necessary measures in the courts of the United States for securing their rights against the directors of the Erie Railway Company.

The Lord Chancellor has acknowledged the receipt of three memorials from the Town Council of Bury, in Lancashire, praying that the bankruptcy cases arising in the Bury County Court should be disposed of at Bury, and not at Bolton, as recently ordered. His Lordship states that the new arrangements were not made without due consideration, and he does not propose to make any change unless expediency or necessity shows it to be required.

To the telegraph offices opened in the neighbourhood of our publishing office, already announced, may now be added—Holborn branch (Gray's-inn Chambers), Red Lion-street, Somerset House, Haxell's Hotel, and Adelaide-street, Strand. It will be observed that the new telegram form obviates the necessity of counting the words, as a space is left for each, and a marginal note shows where the limit of the shilling telegram of twenty words has been reached, as well as the limit of each extra threepence.

Mrs. Myra Bradwell, wife of Judge Bradwell, and editress of the Chicago Legal News, recently petitioned to be made a notary public for the city of Chicago. Governor Palmer, to whom the petition was addressed, expressed no opinion upon the eligibility of women to office, but declined to appoint Mrs. Bradwell, on the ground that, whereas the law required each notary on appointment to enter into a bond for 500 dols., conditioned for good conduct, upon which any person injured by breach of the condition might sue the notary, none of the recent married women's property statutes conferred on wives the power of making binding executory contracts, or made them liable on any contract not referring to their separate property.

LONDON, FEBRUARY, 12, 1870.

THE QUESTION OF THE ELECTION of O'Donovan Rossa gave rise on Thursday evening to an animated and interesting debate. As we had anticipated (see Sol. Journ. Dec. 4, 1869), the difference between a convicted and an attainted felon was, after considerable discussion, and in spite of a most able and ingenious speech from Mr. Henry Matthews, held to be immaterial so far, at any rate, as regarded Rossa's capacity to be elected a member of the Legislature. But although the view taken by the great majority of the House is, no doubt, substantially correct, we venture to think that it might have been based upon a surer foundation than that on which the Solicitor-General was content to rest it. He appears to us to have strained the law when he asserted, as he did in substance, that the incidents of felony all flow from the commission of and conviction for the crime itself. Such a proposition is certainly opposed to the older authorities on the subject, which make a broad and intelligible distinction between criminals who are only convicted and sentenced to secondary punishments, and those who are also attainted (i.e., corrupted in blood), by reason of judgment of death being recorded against them. (See R. v. Bridger, 1 M. & W. 145). In other words the common law in defining the legal position of a criminal looked not only at the quality of the crime committed, but at the quantum of punishment awarded.

The true justification for the course which the House has taken appears to us to be that, according to the decided cases, a felon, whether judgment of death has or has not been recorded against him, is incapable of exercising the rights or of performing the duties of a citizen, whilst he is undergoing his punishment. That this is the law seems settled by the two cases to which we referred our readers in a previous number (December 4, 1869), but of which it may now be worth while to give a somewhat fuller account; we mean R. v. Burridge, 3 P. Wms. 439, and Roberts v. Walker, 1 Russell & Mylne 752. The former case was heard before Lord Hardwicke, when Chief Justice, and Justices Page, Probyn, and Lee, and the Court unanimously decided that "one convicted of felony nithin benefit of clergy [i.e., one against whom judgment of death was not recorded, and who was, therefore, not attainted] and sentenced to be transported for seven years, continues a 'felon' till actual transportation and service pursuant to the sentence; and if a stranger assist such felon-convict to escape, he is an accessory after the fact." According to this authority, therefore, a felon convict, though not attainted, is a "felon" to all intents and purposes, during the period of his sentence, and as such cannot be "harboured, or in any way assisted or comforted" by another. He is not absolutely civilitur mortuus, but he is for the time beyond the pale of citizenship.

The second case (Roberts v. Walker) was heard in 1830, before the Master of the Rolls, who decided that "personal property not at the time of his conviction belonging to a felon convicted of simple larceny, and sentenced [not to death but] to transportation, but accruing to him afterwards before his term of transportation has expired, is forfeited to the Crown." The reason of this decision is plain. The judge thought, and no doubt rightly, that a felon, even though not attainted, could not become the owner of or make a title to property whilst actually paying the penalty of his crime.

The result is that a convicted but unattainted felon has all his rights and privileges suspended until he has either worked out his sentence or received a royal pardon; and for this reason, we think the House of Commons were acting strictly within the limits of law in declaring Rossa "incapable of being elected" member for Tipperary.

OUR READERS will be interested in an adjudication made this month by the Inland Revenue Commissioners upon a deed which was submitted to them in consequence of the late decision in Boulton's case.* The indenture was dated in 1866 and conveyed a plot of land to a purchaser in fee. It contained a covenant in which the purchaser covenanted with the vendor that before the 29th of September, 1866, he would, at his own expense, make an area twelve feet wide before the entire south front of the plot, and enclose such area on the south side with or without a dwarf wall with palisades, and would also before that time enclose the west part of the plot with a fence. And that in case the purchaser should build any dwelling-house upon the plot he would build the front of it to a line distant twelve feet from a certain road which fronted the ground, and would not build, or allow to be built, any building whatever except as aforesaid, upon the plot, within the distance of forty feet of the road, and would pay to the vendor a certain proportion of the costs of repairing the road and of the expense of making an intended passage on the north of the plot and of repairing such passage when made, and that if the purchaser should convey the plot to any other person the conveyance should contain a covenant by such person to observe the foregoing. The deed had been stamped with a fifteen shilling ad valorem stamp, and was now marked by the Commissioners as "duly stamped," without any further duty being necessary.

It would appear, therefore, that the Commissioners were of opinion that the covenant in this case was not a "further or other valuable consideration" within the meaning of 17 & 18 Vict. 83, s. 16. Certainly the distinction between this covenant and that in Boulton's case, appears rather fine, but the reader will hardly be inclined to quarrel with it on that account.

We have received from the Manchester Law Association a copy of a memorial recently forwarded to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by that society. The memorial, which is very well drawn, states forcibly the evils of the bouleversement effected by the decision in Boulton's case, continuing:—

"It has been hitherto universally considered in the legal profession that leases were not liable to any extra duty in consequence of their containing covenants to build, to repair, to insure, or the like; and until very recently the Commissioners of Inland Revenue did not claim any such extra duty.

"Your memorialists therefore hope that, following the plan which has been before adopted when a course universally prevalent, and especially when sanctioned by the practice of the Inland Revenue authorities, has been proved to be erroneous, her Majesty's Government will be pleased to recommend Parliament to pass a bill for the purpose of declaring all leases hitherto made to be sufficiently stamped, although they may not be stamped with the extra duty to which they are now held liable."

And the memorial submits "that whatever is incident to and a usual and substantial part of a transaction, and so generally received, should be considered as and covered by the ad valorem stamp."

We are glad to see that the case has been so well laid before the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and we are also extremely pleased to notice that the memorialists have added a forcible representation of the necessity for the consolidation of the Stamp Laws.

* Reported in to-day's issue of the Weekly Reporter.

The memorial proceeds:—

"Your memorialists further venture to submit that the present state of the stamp laws generally is a discredit to legislation. Nine Acts, having stamps for their principal subject (besides others in which provisions relating to stamps have been thrust in amongst incongruous subjects), have been passed during the last twenty years. Yet these are but a fraction of the enactments on the subject now in force. In the appendix to the Treatise on Stamps by the late Mr. Tilsley, the solicitor to the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue (itself more than 1,000 pages in length), no less than 253 statutes, bearing on the subject are enumerated.

"Your memorialists therefore submit that a bill to revise and consolidate the stamp laws, with a general repeal of all previous enactments on the subject, is imperatively called for.

"Your memorialists further submit that such a measure will be incomplete unless it contain a provision declaring all instruments stamped previously to its becoming law, to be sufficiently stamped, so as to prevent the necessity of any future reference to the chaotic accumulation of enactments now in force."

Concluding with the prayer—

"That her Majesty's Government will be pleased to introduce into Parliament, without loss of time, a measure for confirming the stamps on existing leases, and enacting that future leases shall not be subject to the additional duty above mentioned.

"And afterwards, at as early a period as is consistent with its due preparation, a bill for the general consolidation of the stamp laws."

We heartily agree in this prayer for a consolidation of "the chaotic accumulation" now in force. The stamp laws are a gross instance of a series of enactments amending and re-amending each other till the result, if not "ripe," is certainly "rotten" for reference purposes. In the event of a consolidating Act being passed, the prayer for a declaration invalidating all instruments previously stamped would scarcely, we think, be granted precisely as prayed.

THE RECENT DECISIONS of Sir Robert Phillimore in the cases of Mr. Wix and Mr. Purchas contain several important additions to what we may call the "ceremonial code" of the English Church. Our readers will remember that in Mr. Mackonochie's case it was ruled by the Privy Council that two lighted candles on the communion table were unlawful during the Communion Service, when not necessary for the purpose of giving light; and, by the Arches Court, that to bring in incense at the commencement, and to take it out at the end of the Communion Service, was also unlawful. It has now been held that two lighted candles, not on, but near the communion table, are illegal when used at a similar time for a purpose merely symbolical and not necessary. The use of lights under such circumstances is now declared to be an unauthorised ceremony; and, upon this view, the place where they are burnt, whether on or off the communion table, becomes wholly immaterial. In Martin v. Mackonochie the Privy Council had left it open whether these lighted candles were to be taken as under the category of ornaments or ceremonies, and were content to hold that under either aspect they were illegal, when on the communion table. Mr. Wix's counsel endeavoured to show that in reality the Privy Council had considered them as ornaments, and that, therefore, the situation in which they were set up was of vital importance, but the Arches Court by determining the lighting of them to be a ceremonial act not authorised by the Acts of Uniformity, deprived this argument of the force which it otherwise would have had. With regard to incense, the law has also been extended. For it is now decided that its use is unlawful at the commencement or close of the communion service, even although it is not used during the service itself, but is removed from the church before the actual words of the service are begun to be recited, and is not brought back again until after the benediction is pronounced.

These two points were raised by the charges both against Mr. Wix and Mr. Purchas, and as to the former clergyman they were the only causes of complaint. But Mr. Purchas' mode of conducting his services had laid him open to a perfect cloud of accusations; some of them important, but many almost ridiculous from their childishness and triviality. We shall only refer to the principal question, now for the first time discussed, as to whether or not the "vestments" used in the Church of England by authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of Edward VI. are still legal. The point was only argued on behalf of the promoter before the Dean of Arches, but the judgment of the Court contains a full and doubtless a correct statement of the arguments on which the defendant's party in the Church rely, and which the promoter's counsel, the judge considered, had failed to meet. The whole point in dispute is what is the proper construction to be placed on the prefatory note as to "ornaments" in the Prayer-book. Primâ facie there would seem little room for doubt. The words are these: "And here it is to be noted that such ornaments of the church and the ministers thereof at all times of their ministrations shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the 2nd year of the reign of King Edward VI." If "loquendum est ut vulgus" is the true principle for the interpretation of statutory enactments, the strong expressions of the recent judgment would seem to need no justification: "I really do not believe that any person of plain common sense and ordinary intelligence who reads this language, uninfluenced by considerations arising from supposed consequences, would hesitate as to the interpretation of it."

But then it is said by the promoter that the word "retained" is the governing and critical word in the "note;" and that, unless it can be shown that the ornaments of the minister which were in the Church in the second year of Edward VI., were legally "retained," or, at least, capable of retention, up to the year 1662, the date of the present Prayer-book, they are not legalised by the language of the note. This argument is based upon the 5th section of Elizabeth's Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz. c. 2), which enacts that "such ornaments of the Church and of the ministers thereof shall be retained and be in use as was in this Church of England by authority of Parliament in the second year of King Edward VI., until other order shall be taken by the authority of the Queen's Majesty, with the advice of her Commissioners appointed and authorised under the authority of the Great Seal of England for causes ecclesiastical, or of the Metropolitan of this realm." According to the promoter such "other order" was in fact taken by certain advertisements put forth in 1564—5, prescribing the surplice as the proper ornament for the minister instead of the "vestments" used in the second year of Edward VI. But the Dean of the Arches came to the conclusion first, that these advertisements never had any binding legal authority, and therefore that they left the law unaffected; or, secondly, supposing them to have been duly and properly published, that, inasmuch as they contained no prohibitory words, they left the law as it was before. Their real object seemed, he said, to be to provide for a minimum of decency, not to check those who were disposed to approach the maximum.

Setting aside these advertisements, therefore, and being further of opinion that neither by injunction nor canon any "other order" had been legally made, the judge's conclusion inevitably followed that the "note" in our present Prayer-book must be read in law as one would read it by the ordinary rules of popular construction. Accordingly, it is now authoritatively declared that the ancient vestments, prescribed by the first Prayer-book of Edward VI., may, and, indeed, it would seem, must be worn by our clergy. It should be added that this judgment seems to be in accordance with the opinion on the meaning of the prefatory note expressed by the Privy Council in Liddell v. Westerton (Moore, p. 159).

We need scarcely say that the indefatigable Church Association, who supply the "sinews of war" for the most of the prosecutions of clergymen which have of late been so unhappily frequent, do not mean to accept the adverse decision of Sir R. Phillimore upon this vexed question without appeal. The Privy Council will, therefore, be shortly called on to review the interpretation of the "note" they adopted in Liddell v. Westerton; but we shall be surprised to find that they see any reason to alter their previous decision.

ANOTHER PLAN is proposed for cutting short the expense and delay of the Albert Life Assurance Company's liquidation. A provisional committee of policy-holders, annuitants, and shareholders, among whom we observe the names of Mr. Webster, Q.C., Mr. Horatio Lloyd, Sir John Bowring, and other persons of position, has put forth in a prospectus a proposal for reconstruction of the Albert Office, as the best and only means of avoiding a tedious and expensive liquidation, equally disastrous to the assured and to shareholders. The prospectus computes the liabilities at £444,000. It then states that "the unpaid capital of the Albert Office, which is primarily liable for the deficiency stated, and which must necessarily be called up, amounts to £321,989; and it is estimated by the liquidators that, allowing for those shareholders who are without means of meeting their liabilities, there will be realised from this source not less than £150,000." This leaves a balance of £294,000, and it is proposed that £34,000 of this should be contributed by the solvent Albert shareholders, in excess of their liabilities, and that the remaining £260,000 should be found by the "amalgamated" companies, "whose 'actuarial liability' is put at £547,000. By this scheme it is anticipated that non-profit policyholders can be paid 87½ per cent. in cash, profit policyholders 90 per cent. (but all policies under six years standing from 1st January, 1870, to be paid in full), and annuitants 90 per cent. of their instalments, the remaining per centage to be deferred, as a guarantee margin, but liquidated from time to time by instalments.

Taking the gross amount of the claims of the assured upon the Albert and its amalgamated offices, it seems impossible that any better terms could be made for them; whether or not these terms are possible may remain to be seen. The great difficulty of effecting any such re-constructive arrangement must arise from the diversity of interests involved and the fact that as yet very little has been done towards marshalling the various claims upon the various companies implicated. Of course no scheme which imposes an extra liability upon shareholders can be binding except by consent; the decision in Clinch v. Financial Corporation (17 W. R. 84) is hardly necessary to establish that proposition: at present the difficulties in the way of getting enough consents appear to us insuperable. Until the claims have been marshalled into something like a definite distribution no arrangement can be anything more than a blind lottery. The prospectus assumes that the Albert assets are primarily liable, but where the assured prefers, as General Potts preferred, to attack the original assurers, the Albert liability will be proportionately reduced.

By the "actual liability" of the amalgamated offices we understand the gross liability on policies or annuities granted originally by them; but what proportion of that liability could legally be thrust upon those societies, and what proportion of those assured can claim only on the Albert has not yet been approximately settled. The settlement depends upon the old question of intention and acquiescence, to which we have alluded before; that must be a question of fact in each case, but the cases will probably, in effect, be separable into family groups, each governed by the same result. There has been no decision as yet upon a policyholder's case. We ourselves have advanced the opinion that the acts of policyholders have in most cases amounted to what should be deemed recognition of the substituted liability of the Albert. Vice-Chancellor Malins, it seems, is of our opinion, but the remarks of Lord Hatherley in the annuity case led us to imagine that, were a policy case to be presented to the Lord Chancellor, his Lordship's view would be opposed to ours. For ourselves, with deference, we adhere to our old opinion. But whatever should be the principle laid down by the Court, the result would probably furnish data sufficient to marshal the liabilities approximately, though roughly. Possibly, the result would be such an apportionment that no arrangement would be possible; that might be the case if the apportionment were very unequal. We should certainly desire to see any arrangement carried out which would cut short the expense of the ordinary liquidation; and even a speculative compromise made by parties in the dark as to their respective liabilities, would be preferable to a protracted and litigious liquidation, swallowing up the assets in costs. It is, at any rate, well that we should point out that an arrangement at present would be speculative.

AT THE GUILDHALL on Tuesday Samuel Charles Boulter, aged seventeen, living at 17, Clifton-street, was charged before Alderman Gibbons with counselling a pressman, in the service of Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode, printers, to commit a felony, by inciting him to steal an examination paper belonging to the Incorporated Law Society. It appeared that the prisoner was an intending candidate for the preliminary examination held this week at the Law Institute. He stated (we copy the Times report) that he had been ill-advised, and he hoped he would be dealt with leniently. Alderman Gibbons said the prisoner had very improperly tried to get information before the time when it would be given to him. Looking at his age, and the serious consequences that imprisonment would be to him, he would not send him to prison, but bind him over, in his own recognizances in £20 to appear if called upon.

The storekeeper of the printers said it was not their wish that the prisoner should be severely dealt with, but they were compelled to take these steps against him because their workpeople were so frequently tempted by candidates to get proofs of the questions for examination. Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode deserve credit for bringing this offender forward. The chance of a candidate slipping through an examination which he was really incompetent to pass is as nothing compared with that of a person being admitted to the responsibility and status of a solicitor, who could be guilty of so dishonourable an act as to attempt surreptitiously to anticipate examination questions. Is it possible that the storekeeper of Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode was correct in stating that such dishonourable attempts are frequently made?

THE SOUTHWARK RETURNING OFFICER and Mr. Odger's expenses are just now in everybody's mouth. Is not the matter merely this? The returning officer has no legal claim on candidates for the expenses of erecting hustings, engaging poll-clerks, and so forth, until they have been duly put in nomination; but as the poll day follows closely on that of nomination, the expense of taking the poll would be enormously increased if the arrangements were not put in hand till after the nomination, and so had to be hurried through at express speed. Therefore, in practice, the returning officer usually commences them beforehand, receiving an indemnity from the candidate. If such an indemnity were refused, the returning officer would, we apprehend, be justified in postponing his preparations till after the nomination, and charging the candidate with the increased cost, and, quoad the refusing candidate, could not be compelled to take any steps involving himself in any liability. Whether or not the amount tendered by Mr. Odger was sufficient, is a question upon which we can offer no opinion.

* But for some reason not stated, mutual offices, such for instance as the Kent Mutual, are not included in this computation, though the liabilities on their account must form a solid item.

RATING AND POOR LAW CASES OF 1869.

NO. I.

The rating cases of the last year are perhaps of rather less interest than usual. However, fresh legislation on the subject is in prospect, based, we suppose, on the returns moved for last year; and we trust that the statement in her Majesty's speech, that "Bills have been prepared for extending the incidence of rating, and for placing the collection of the large sums locally raised for various purposes on a simple and uniform footing," may foreshadow a comprehensive and satisfactory measure. At all events, the subject of rating is a matter of interest at present, and we shall therefore follow our usual custom, and lay before our readers a review of the rating cases of the past year.

In Reg. v. The Rhymney Railway Company (17 W. R. 530, L. R. 4 Q. B. 276) the real question, when extricated from detail, was the simple one whether the railway company were to be rated at the full rateable value of certain wharves in their occupation, or only to the extent of their beneficial interest therein, after deducting for wharfage dues on goods shipped and unshipped at the wharves, which dues the landlords, who were the Marquis of Bute's trustees, had reserved to themselves. No doubt some rather unsatisfactory cases were found to bolster up the argument for the railway company; but when the true principle of rating, so often pointed out by us, is borne in mind—viz., that you are to consider, not what the property is worth to the actual occupier, but what the hypothetical tenant from year to year would give for it as it is, there can, we think, be little doubt how the question in this case should be answered. The principle adverted to was clearly laid down in Jones v. The Mersey Docks (13 W. R. 1069, 11 H. L. C. 443), and was acted on in Reg. v. Shelford (15 W. R. 1035), which we discussed ante vol. xii. p. 378. There it was held, overruling Lord Campbell's decision in The Hackney case (R. v. Goodchild, 27 L. J. M. C. 233), that in assessing the tithe rent-charge to the poor rate the incumbent of three parishes united in one benefice was not entitled to have his curate's stipends deducted, because the question was, not what the rent-charge was worth to him, but what it would be worth to the hypothetical tenant. It is clear that if the wharf dues had been included in the demise to the railway company, they would have been rateable for the whole; and it is also clear that the Marquis of Bute's trustees, who were only occupiers of the docks and not of the wharves from the use of which the dues arose, could not be rated for wharf dues reserved by them; it therefore follows that, unless the occupiers of the wharves were rated for them, no one could be, and the parish would lose pro tanto. Thus convenience as well as principle points to the conclusion at which the Queen's Bench arrived—viz., that the occupiers must be rated at the full value. The cases chiefly relied on by the railway company were cases in which the question was whether the worth of the right to take game should be deducted from the value of the occupation of land. Thus, in Reg. v. Thurstone (7 W. R. 192) it was held that a tenant could only be rated on the diminished value where the right to the game had been previously granted away by the landlord; but this decision has been questioned before, and in the present case the Court calls it of somewhat doubtful authority; and, besides, where the right to the game is thus severed from the land, it becomes an incorporeal right in gross, and cannot be assessed at all (Hilton v. Bowes, 14 W. R.

368). In Reg. v. The Battle Union (15 W. R. 57), which we discussed ante vol. xii. p. 357, an owner and occupier was held rateable at the full value, although he let the right to the game to a third person; and that case, therefore, which is scarcely consistent with Reg. v. Thurstone, goes on the same principle as the present. Another case relied on by the railway company was the Mayor of Lincoln v. Holmes Common, which we discussed ante vol. xii. p. 377. There the Corporation of Lincoln were held not to be rateable for the occupation of a common over which certain freemen had a profit a prendre; but that was because the right was so extensive as to render the occupation of the corporation absolutely valueless— which clearly distinguishes the case from the present.

In the next case, Reg. v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (17 W. R. 527, L. R. 4 Q. B. 15) the question was whether certain sewers and drainage works were rateable. The board made nothing by them, but, by their Act, had to maintain them by a rate; in fact, the respondents were driven to contend that the occupation of the sewers was valuable, "in the sense that they conveyed away the sewage of the houses that drained into them." Clearly these sewers are not, as Lush, J., put it, "at present," the subject of beneficial occupation, any more than was the common in the Mayor of Lincoln v. Holmes Common (supra). There is a reservation implied in the "at present" of Mr. Justice Lush; was his Lordship sanguinely anticipating a time when the London sewage will be sold at a profit? We trust he was, and then, we apprehend, the sewers would become rateable, just as we pointed out in the Lincoln case (vol. xii. 378) that if the freemen so decreased in number that their cattle could not eat all the herbage of the common, the occupation of it by the corporation would become beneficial and rateable. With regard to the drainage works, consisting of engine-houses, buildings, &c., the Court held that they were rateable, because they had an occupation value. The board must have rented them if they had not owned them, and, no doubt, could let them, if allowed so to do. It was said that the pumping apparatus was a mere accessory to the sewers, and that, therefore, if the sewers were not rateable, neither could the pumps be; and R. v. Bilston (5 B. & C. 851) was cited for this position; but, as we showed (ante vol. xiii., p. 393) the engine which was there held not rateable, because merely used to work an ironstone mine—a species of mine not within the Statute of Elizabeth—was erected in the mine itself; whereas, here the pumps were erected on land apart from the sewers. So a tramway, at the bottom of a mine not falling within the Statute of Elizabeth, as not being a coal mine, would not be rateable, but if it led from the mine over other land it would be: R. v. Bell, 7 T. R. 598.

The two next cases on our list are Grant v. The Local Board of Oxford (17 W. R. 76, L. R. 4 Q. B. 9), and R. v. Llantrisant (17 W. R. Q. B. 671, L. R. 4 Q. B. 354). The former we fully discussed ante vol. xiii., 394, and the latter simply re-affirms what was held in The Great Eastern Railway Company v. Haughley (14 W. R. 779, L. R. 1 Q. B. 666), viz., that a railway company occupying a branch line cannot be rated for it at an increased value, in consideration of its acting as a feeder to their main line.

The remaining case on rating proper is Edwards v. The Overseers of Rusholme (17 W. R. 821, L. R. 4 Q. B. 554). It was long ago found that occupiers of the poorer sort would decamp with their goods, leaving their rates (and probably their rents, too) unpaid; and, as the goods were gone, the overseers had no remedy, while the incoming tenants were not assessed at all, and consequently the parish lost the rate altogether. To remedy this state of things, 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 12, provided that where the current rate had not been paid when the occupier went out, the outgoing and incoming tenant should each pay a part of it proportioned to the length of his occupation; but, by a singular oversight, no provision was made for the event of the house standing empty between the two tenancies. The question in the case before us was, who was to pay the rate for this intermediate period? If the house had remained empty, and no new tenant had come in, the first occupier would have remained liable for the whole rate; and therefore it is clear that the Legislature did not so much mean to relieve him as to provide the parish with a better security for the rate. The new occupier, said the Court, is to pay for the time he occupies; and the old occupier, whom the Act does not intend to relieve, remains liable for the rest, and therefore for the period during which the house stands empty, as well as that during which he actually occupies. The statute was somewhat difficult to construe, and the Court has done some violence to its words, but we think justifiably. The section on which the case turned is repealed by an Act of last session, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, s. 16; its provisions, however, are substantially re-enacted, but with the additional limitation, that the outgoing occupier "shall remain liable in like manner for so much, and no more, of the rate as is proportionate to the time of his occupation within the period for which the rate was made." This looks very like a legislative interpretation of the Act of Geo. II., the reverse of that adopted by the Court; but hereafter there can be no doubt on the point.

In our next we purpose discussing the rating cases in connection with the Union Assessment Committee Acts, and shall then make a few remarks on the nearly allied removal cases.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

JURISDICTION—BILL TO RECOVER FROM HUSBAND MONEY ADVANCES TO WIFE FOR NECESSARIES.

Deare v. Soutten, M.R., 18 W. R. 203.

Although a husband who has deserted his wife, and does not provide her with necessaries, is on proof of such non-provision liable to persons supplying her with necessaries, yet a person who advances money for the support of a married woman whose husband has deserted her and does not contribute to her support, has no demand enforceable at law against the husband for the advances (Knorr v. Bushell, 3 C. B. N. S. 334). An action will lie for a loan to the wife at the request, express or implied, of the husband (Stevenson v. Hardie, 2 W. Bl. 872); but in the absence of such request there is no remedy at law, and the only remedy is by bill in equity for so much of the money advanced as can be shown to have been actually applied by or on behalf of the wife in paying for necessaries. Further than this, the husband is liable neither at law nor in equity.

In Jenner v. Morris (9 W. R. 391, 3 D. F. J. 45), where the plaintiff, who had deserted his wife, had filed a bill to enforce a judgment against the real estate of the defendant, it was held that the defendant was entitled to set-off against the judgment debt sums which, both before and after the date of the judgment, had been advanced by him for the wife's support.

This apparent anomaly may depend on the fact that the courts of law do not recognise any privity between the husband and the person who has furnished the wife with money for necessaries, or has paid the tradespeople who have supplied her with necessaries.

It has been said that equity considers the debt to have been assigned by the original creditor to the third party who pays it on behalf of the wife, and thus recognises his right to sue, notwithstanding the want of privity between the parties. This method of explaining the origin of the jurisdiction, however, can hardly apply where the money has been paid to the wife, and not to the tradespeople direct. The probability is that the jurisdiction was simply assumed to meet a defect in the common law.

At all events, the jurisdiction is of no recent origin. In Harris v. Lee (1 P. Wms. 482) the Court assumed, without the least hesitation, that though a married woman cannot, at law, borrow money, though for necessaries, so as to bind her husband; yet, where money has actually been applied for her use in the purchase of necessaries, the person advancing the money may, in equity, stand in the place of those who furnished such necessaries, so as to be able to sue the husband therefor. It need scarcely be added, that a bill will only lie for what was expended on necessaries strictly speaking, and an inquiry as to this will, in most cases, be directed. (See a singular case in the "Annual Register," 1776 [Chronicle, p. 117], which was tried before Lord Chancellor Bathurst.)

In a case where a man had gone abroad and left his wife unprovided for, and a third person lent her money to purchase necessaries, and she applied it accordingly, Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, proceeding upon a notion that the debt was a legal debt, allowed the husband's demurrer to a bill filed against him by the person who had lent the money: May v. Sky, 16 Sim. 588. (See Hirst v. Tolson, 16 Sim. 623.)

May v. Sky, however, is no longer law: Jenner v. Morris (ubi sup.) And there can now be no question as to the jurisdiction of the Court in such cases. It may be added that the Court possesses a similar jurisdiction in the case of infants: Marlow v. Pitfield, 1 P. Wms. 558, where the real estate of a person who had borrowed money to pay for necessaries during his minority, was held liable in equity for it after his decease; whereas, at law his infancy might have been given in evidence on a plea of non assumpsit.

EVIDENCE TO SHOW CHANGE OF DOMICIL.

Capdeville v. Capdeville, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 107.

Residence in England for twenty years from youth until death, the purchase and occupation of a house in England, and the description of that house in the testator's will as "home" were held in this case to be not enough to show a change of domicile, which was originally French, as regulating the testamentary acts of the individual. So too in Udny v. Udny (L. R. 1 Sc. App. 441), the Law Lords were satisfied that a person whose absence from Scotland continued much longer, had never abandoned his Scottish domicile. In point of fact, length of absence has nothing to do with the question in these cases, which depends solely upon the intention of the party as deducible from the facts in evidence. It is not enough for him to take a house in the new country, even with the probability and the belief that he may remain there all the days of his life. Change of residence alone, however long and continued, does not effect a change of domicile; there must be an intention to change the domicile (Maorhouse v. Lord, 11 W. R. 637, 10 H. L. Cas. 272). Furthermore, every man's domicile of origin must be presumed to continue until he has acquired another sole domicile by actual residence, with the intention of abandoning his domicile of origin. This change must be animo et facto, and the burden of proving it lies upon the party who asserts the change (Aikman v. Aikman, 3 Macq. 877). To the same effect was the decision of Vice-Chancellor Wood in Forbes v. Forbes (2 W. R. 253, Kay 341), that actual change of domicile will not deprive a man of his domicile of origin, until he has acquired another. And when a man has acquired a domicile of choice, and afterwards abandons it, the domicile of origin revives (Munro v. Munro, 7 Cl. & Fin. 871)—at all events whilst he is deliberating before he makes a second choice. The true meaning of Story ("Conflict of Laws," s. 48) is, that the abandonment of an acquired domicile ipso facto restores the domicile of origin, a special intention to revert to it being unnecessary (Udny v. Udny, ubi sup.). On these grounds the decision in Capdeville v. Capdeville is probably correct. The domicile of origin was French; and the applicants, on whom the burden lay of proving an intention to change the domicile, failed to show that the domicile of origin had been abandoned animo, as it had apparently been facto, and an English domicile taken up by choice.

COMMON LAW.
CONTINGENT WILL.

In the goods of Porter, Prob., 18 W. R. 231.

A will, like any other instrument, may be made absolutely, or subject to some condition precedent; that is, it may be made to take effect on death whenever and wherever the testator may die, or it may be made so as only to take effect on the occurrence or non-occurrence of some event. Whether a will is absolute or contingent must, of course, be decided by reference to its language which must be read according to the ordinary rules of legal construction.

A decision on one will on this question of contingency is not often an authority for the construction of any other will. In the goods of Porter, however, a short rule has been laid down for ascertaining whether a will is or is not contingent. If a particular event is referred to as the reason for making the will, then the will is not contingent, "but if the testator refers to the possible occurrence of any event in language which is so mixed up with the disposition of his property, that he makes the disposition of property dependent upon that event, then the Court must hold the will to be contingent, otherwise, it would violate the language of the will."

The facts of this case illustrate this rule very clearly. The material words in the will were "being obliged to leave England to join my regiment in China, and not having time to make a will, I leave this paper, containing my wishes and desires. Should anything unfortunate happen to me while I am abroad, I wish everything that I may be in possession of at that time," &c., &c. Lord Penzance said that if the testator had stopped at the word "abroad," the will would have been absolute. The going abroad would have been construed as the reason only for making the will. As, however, the testator purported to dispose only of his property, which should be in his possession "at that time," the will was held to be contingent upon his dying abroad. The rule in this case, taken with this illustration, is as clear as any rule for the construction of documents can be, however difficult may be the application of the rule to the wording of any individual will.

INSURANCE OF FREIGHT—WHEN INTEREST IN FREIGHT COMMENCES.

Barber v. Fleming, Q.B., 18 W. R. 254.

Phillips on Insurance, section 328, lays down the following rule with respect to the time at which an interest in freight commences: "It commences not only by the vessel's sailing with the cargo on board, but also when the owner or hirer having goods ready to ship or a contract with another person for freight, has commenced the voyage or has incurred expense or taken steps towards the earning of the freight," and he illustrates the rule thus, "a vessel being chartered from A. to B.; the interest in the freight commences under the charter-party, on the vessel sailing for A. in ballast." There was no English decision which fully supported this proposition, so that, notwithstanding the high authority of "Phillips on Insurance," the rule could not be considered as settled English law. Barber v. Fleming raised the very point put by Mr. Phillips, as the illustration of his rule, and this point was decided in accordance with that rule, which was referred to as an authority for the decision.

The facts were shortly that the plaintiff chartered a vessel, of which he was owner, to go from Bombay to the Chinha Islands, where she was to arrive on or before a specified day, and there to load and to carry the cargo to England at a certain freight to be paid for such cargo. The charterer had the right of going to any ports he liked for cargo, &c., before he went to the Chinchas. The plaintiff insured the freight to become due to him under this charter-party, and subsequently the vessel sailed in ballast direct for the Chinchas, and did not take advantage of the leave to make intermediate voyages.

She was lost before she arrived at the Chinchas. The question was whether the plaintiff could recover the freight he had insured, the contention for the defendant, the insurer, being that the plaintiff's interest in the freight had not commenced, and that, therefore, he had not lost the freight by the perils insured against. It was admitted that if the charter-party had been in the ordinary form, that the ship should proceed with all convenient speed to the Chinchas, the plaintiff's interest would have commenced. A distinction was, however, drawn in argument between that and the present case, where the shipowner might make intermediate voyages. It was held that under the circumstances of this case this made no difference, because "the reason and spirit of the rule is not because the owner is acting under compulsion," (in the sending his ship to the port of loading), "but because he has acted so far under the contract as to show that it is no longer speculative, but he has actually begun to do something which makes the insurable interest attach and makes it a real thing, and, therefore, as soon as the ship had begun to sail the interest sufficiently attached."

If the vessel had carried freight from Bombay to the Chinchas or to any intermediate port, or had made any intermediate voyages as was permitted by the charter-party, and was lost during one of such intermediate voyages, a different question would have arisen, because then the sailing of the vessel would not necessarily come within the condition of the rule that the shipowner should have "commenced the voyage or incurred expense, or taken steps towards the earning of the freight." This point, however, did not arise in Barber v. Fleming, and the Court guard themselves against its being supposed that they decided that question.

RIGHT OF ACTION—PRIVITY—NEGLIGENCE.

George and Wife v. Skirington, Ex., 18 W. R. 118.

Few cases are better known than Langridge v. Levy (2 M. & W. 519, 4 M. & W. 337), where the plaintiff was injured by the bursting of a gun, which the defendant had sold with a fraudulent warranty to the plaintiff's father, who bought the gun as the defendant knew for the use of the plaintiff as well as of himself.

It was held that the plaintiff could maintain the action, although there was no contract between him and the defendant, and there was no fraudulent misrepresentation by the defendant directly to him. The Court treated the case as analogous to those like Pasley v. Freeman (3 T. R. 51) where a misrepresentation is fraudulently made to the plaintiff whereby he suffers damage. The misrepresentation was not made directly to the plaintiff, but the Court held that the same legal results followed as if it had been so made, because there was a false and fraudulent representation "by the defendant, with a view that the plaintiff should use the instrument in a dangerous way, and unless the representation had been made the dangerous act would never have been done." The essence of this decision is fraud by the defendant and knowledge by him that the gun was intended for the plaintiff's use, a subsequent use of the gun by the plaintiff in consequence of such fraudulent representation, and damage resulting thereby to the plaintiff (see Eastwood v. Bain, 3 H. & N. 742; Baker v. Kemble, 7 C. B. N. S. 267).

The ratio decidendi in the judgment goes no further than the point actually decided, and it has hitherto generally been thought that the Courts would not extend the principle of this decision: Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Company (8 Ell. & Bl. 1052, 3).

George v. Skirington has now extended the principle of Langridge v. Levy most materially. The case was decided on demurrer to a declaration by the plaintiff and his wife, which alleged that the plaintiff bought of the defendant, a chemist, for the use of the female plaintiff, as the defendant knew, a hair-wash, alleged by the defendant to be made of ingredients known only to himself, and that the defendant represented that this hair-wash was fit and proper to be used on the hair, and was properly compounded. Yet the defendant so improperly compounded the hair-wash that the same was not fit and proper to be used on the hair, by reason whereof the female plaintiff, who used the hair-wash, was injured. It was held that the declaration disclosed a good cause of action by the female plaintiff, who of course had to be joined with her husband in the action.

The defendant argued, first, that he was not liable even to the plaintiff, because there was no implied warranty of quality on the sale of a chattel, and that therefore he was not liable for the badness of his hair-wash, as fraud was not alleged. Secondly, even if the plaintiff could maintain the action, yet the plaintiff and his wife together could not, because the female plaintiff had no right of action at all; there can be no right of action for a breach of duty arising out of a contract at the suit of one not a party to the contract, except under the authority of Langridge v. Levy, and the principle of that decision was strictly limited to the case of fraud in the defendant. The Court decided that there was a duty on the defendant to sell hair-wash that was not improperly compounded, and that, as in this case the sale was to the plaintiff for the use of the female plaintiff to the defendant's knowledge, the duty existed towards her as well as towards the other plaintiff, and that consequently the action was properly brought in the names of the two plaintiffs for the right of action of the female plaintiff.

As no fraud was alleged in the declaration this decision goes far beyond that of Langridge v. Levy, and it is the first decision where such an extension of the principle of Langridge v. Levy has been permitted. The principle of George v. Skivington is that if one person undertakes a duty towards another, the latter may have a right of action against the former for negligence in the performance of that duty although the duty arose originally entirely from a contract between the first and some third person. This principle is not a new one although it has never until now been applied to such cases as that of George v. Skivington. For instance, if A. employs a doctor to attend to B., and the doctor is negligent in his treatment, B. has a right of action against the doctor for the consequences of such negligence, although no party to, and ignorant of, the contract between A. and B. This is a well-known liability and one which has been long recognised. (Pippin v. Sheppard, 11 Price 400; Gledwell v. Steggall, 5 Bing. P. C. 733). The fact that the hair-wash in George v. Skivington was bought for the use of the female plaintiff was held to create a sufficient privity between her and the defendant to support the right of action by her, although there was no fraud by the defendant.

There was a very good reason for treating the right of action as that of the wife who was in fact injured, instead of that of her husband. He could have maintained an action for the breach of contract in selling improperly compounded hair-wash, but could not apparently have recovered substantial damages, as he personally had sustained no injury by the defendant's breach of contract sufficient to entitle him to such damages. The female plaintiff, on the other hand, being the person actually injured, was clearly the proper person to sue and to recover such damages as naturally resulted from the wrong, if, as a matter of law, she had a right of action. The case of George v. Skivington will probably be often cited and discussed, as it is an important extension of a principle that has hitherto been very carefully restricted.

ESTOPPEL IN PAIS.

Morris v. Bethell, 18 W. R. 137.

An estoppel is a conclusive admission which cannot be denied. Such an admission may be made by mere words or by conduct, and is then called an estoppel in pais. The rule as to what constitutes an estoppel in pais has been thus laid down in Pickard v. Sears (6 Ad. & Ell. 474), the leading case on the subject—"Where one by his words or conduct wilfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at that time." It is the essence of an estoppel in pais that the person seeking to avail himself of it should have altered his own position in consequence of the admission which he wishes to treat as an estoppel.

This doctrine was discussed in Morris v. Bethell where the defendant was sued upon an acceptance not made or authorised by him. He had once before paid a similar acceptance written by the same person in the hands of the plaintiff. The plaintiff sought to treat the single payment by the defendant as an estoppel or as an admission what the defendant could not deny that such acceptances were his, and that he was bound to pay them. The Court held that there was no estoppel, and that "to hold that the doctrine of estoppel applied to such a case would be contrary to law and common sense."

It is necessary to observe that this judgment is grounded on the fact found by the jury that the defendant had not held out to the plaintiff that the acceptance was the defendant's. The single payment of the first acceptance might be some evidence of such a holding out, but was not conclusive; and, therefore, not an estoppel. As, therefore, the jury found that there was no such holding out, the plaintiff was entitled to the verdict. Of course, if the defendant had represented himself as the person liable on the acceptances he might have fallen within the rule laid down in Pickard v. Sears, if any one was thereby induced to alter his position. Whether such representation existed in fact or not, is a question for the jury to consider with all the facts of the case. Morris v. Bethell merely decides that the facts there existing did not come within the doctrine of estoppel in pais.

CRIMINAL LAW.

PRACTICE—PERJURY—FALSE OATH—COMMON LAW MISDEMEANOUR.

Reg. v. Hodgkiss, C.C.R., 18 W. R. 150.

The prisoner in this case was found guilty on an indictment for perjury in swearing a false affidavit under the Bills of Sale Act for the purpose of getting a bill of sale filed. The Court held that he could not be guilty of perjury in the technical sense of the word, because the false oath was not made in any judicial proceeding, and there was no statute which rendered a false affidavit under the Bills of Sale Act perjury. The conviction was, however, upheld, as a conviction for taking a false oath which is a misdemeanour at common law when the oath is required for the purposes of a statute. The prisoner, therefore, could be sentenced to the punishment for the common law misdemeanour, but not for the technical crime of perjury.

The case is not only an authority for this point of practice, but Kelly, C.B., clearly lays down the principle that to take a false oath for a purpose required by a statute is a misdemeanour at common law. This is not a new principle, but this case will probably often be cited for this proposition, as it states the law with the greatest conciseness, and as the decision itself depended upon the application of this principle.

Among the gentlemen recommended to the Lord Chancellor to form the new Commission of the Peace for the borough of Wakefield, we observe the names of William Shaw, Esq., barrister-at-law, of St. John's, Wakefield; Samuel Bruce, Esq., of Burton-street, Wakefield, a member of the Chancery Bar; and William Henry Belford Toulmin, ironfounder, who is an attorney on the rolls, though not practising.

REVIEWS.

The Bankruptcy Act, 1869; The Debtors Act, 1869; and the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869; together with the General Rules, with introduction, notes, and a full index. By C. W. LOVESEY, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Knight & Co. 1870.

Mr. Lovesey's edition of the new Acts belongs to much the same class as several others which we have already noticed. The Acts, rules, and forms are printed one after another; and to the various sections of the Act are appended a few short notes, sometimes explanatory, sometimes pointing out the similarity or the difference between the old law and the new. Mr. Lovesey's edition has, however, one decided point of superiority over the other editions which we have noticed, in that it contains pretty full references from the Act to the rules and forms, a matter of no small importance.

The Debtors Act, 1869, with the Regule Generales of Michaelmas Term, 1869; the rules, forms, and fees, affecting committals in the county courts, notes and an index. By G. MANBY WETHERFIELD, Solicitor. London: Longmans, 1870.

Mr. Wetherfield has printed the Debtors Act, and the rules and forms framed under it; and to each of the three parts into which the Act is divided, he has prefixed some introductory observations which may probably prove of use to those who are as yet strangers to the Act and are not very familiar with the branches of law with which it is connected.

COURTS.

EXCHEQUER.

(Before BRAMWELL, B., and a Special Jury.)

Feb. 9.—Matthews v. Collis and Another.

This was an action for negligence against a Birmingham firm of solicitors. It appeared that one Lawson, who traded in America, being in England, and being largely indebted to the plaintiff, the latter instructed the defendants to obtain his arrest. Instead, however, of at once arresting him, one of the defendants called on him and urged him to settle the claim, telling him at the same time that proceedings had been taken. Consequently on this Lawson got away to America, and the plaintiff alleged that, after costly litigation in America, he had had to accept a compromise for £3,000 where £7,000 was due. For the defence it was argued that the extensive American litigation was unnecessary, as plaintiff might have had an English judgment which the American courts would have enforced.

BRAMWELL, B., told the jury that the defendants, by endeavouring to act with kindness towards Lawson had clearly made themselves liable; the only question, therefore, would be as to the amount of damages.

Verdict for the plaintiff £1,800.

BAIL COURT.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Feb. 2, 9.—Re Bernadat.

Rules 50, 178, and 179.

This was an application at the instance of the trustee under this bankruptcy for the commitment of the holder of a bill of sale of a portion of the bankrupt's effects, and other persons, for a contempt of court.

Bagley and Brough for the trustee.

Sargood, Serjt., and F. Knight, for the bill of sale holder.

It appeared that a rule to show cause had been granted on the 26th ult., upon certain affidavits filed by the trustee, but that afterwards certain other affidavits were filed, and served, together with the notice, upon the defendants.

Sargood, Serjt., objected to the reception of affidavits other than those upon which the rule was granted. He referred to the 178th and 179th rules.

Bagley said that in practice it would be extremely inconvenient if the person moving for a commitment for contempt were compelled at the outset to file all his affidavits. It might be that after the granting of the rule facts important to the issue came to the knowledge of the applicant. In this case the whole of the affidavits relied upon had been duly served, and the respondents, in their affidavits, had disputed or challenged the facts therein set forth.

The CHIEF JUDGE intimated that, as a matter of convenience, it was desirable that the whole of the affidavits intended to be used in support of the application should be filed in the first instance, but at the same time he was not disposed to shut out any evidence.

Upon the matter coming on again,

Sargood, Serjt., asked that the respondents should have liberty to cross-examine the deponents who had made affidavits in support of the application.

The CHIEF JUDGE objected to the adoption of this course. He said it might be necessary ultimately, but the better mode would be to proceed in the usual way by affidavits, and if upon the hearing it seemed to be indispensable that witnesses should be summoned, an order would be made for that purpose.

Reed, for the trustee appointed under this adjudication, moved for an injunction to restrain Messrs. Harrison, auctioneers, from proceeding to a sale of the bankrupt's furniture and effects.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—Do the facts appear upon the affidavits?

Reed.—Yes, and they seem to be these: On the 9th September, 1869, the bankrupt executed in favour of Messrs. Harrison a bill of sale of his furniture and effects, to secure a sum of £130, then advanced. On the 12th January the bankrupt signed a declaration of insolvency; on the 13th Messrs. Harrison took possession, and on the 14th the adjudication was made. He referred to the 11th, 15th, 20th (concluding clause), and 72nd sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

His LORDSHIP granted an interim injunction.

Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 159—Order of discharge.

This was an application on behalf of W. H. Godden, the creditors' assignee, that the conditional order of discharge granted to the bankrupt by the late Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, on the 25th March, 1867, should be rescinded, on the ground that the bankrupt had not complied with the condition upon which the same had been granted.

F. Knight for the applicant.

It appeared that at the hearing the bankrupt proposed to set aside one-fifth of his future earnings until the debts due under the bankruptcy were paid in full, and the order of discharge was granted on that condition. The affidavits showed that the bankrupt had paid one year's proportion only of his income to the official assignee, and that, notwithstanding numerous applications, he had omitted to make any further payment, or, indeed, to render any account of his earnings.

No cause was shown in opposition, and

The CHIEF JUDGE adjourned the consideration of the application for fourteen days, the bankrupt in the meantime to pay £20 to the official assignee, and thereafter to abide by the terms of the order.

Insolvency—Relinquishment by provisional assignee of claim against bankrupt's property.

The insolvent applied for an order directing the provisional assignee to relinquish any claim to an interest in certain residuary estates, which the insolvent had acquired in right of his wife. The insolvency took place in September, 1856, and in April of the following year the insolvent obtained his final order. All the creditors, with the exception of one, had been satisfied, and he did not appear on the notice which had been given. In April last, an interest which the insolvent had under the will of his wife's father, subject to the death of a tenant for life, fell into possession, and the insolvent swore that upon the marriage no settlement or agreement for a settlement was made or executed.

F. Knight, for the applicant.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the interest seemed to be of small value (about £200), and the Court was desirous of assisting the applicant so far as it properly could, but it would be satisfactory, if, before the order was made, the wife were presented for examination, in order that it should be shown that she was a consenting party to the application. This would be in accordance with the practice which had prevailed in the Court of Chancery in similar cases.

COUNTY COURTS.

WALLINGFORD.

(Before JAMES WHIGHAM, Esq., Judge.)

Hickman v. Corner, Bennett, and Castle.

Insanity held to be "sickness" within the meaning of the Friendly Societies Acts.

This was an action brought by Mr. Isaac Hickman against the defendants, the trustees and secretary of the Julius Caesar Court of Foresters, at Wallingford, to recover the sum of £11 9s. 7d., claimed to be due to the plaintiff for sick allowance under the rules of the society. It was arranged between the parties that no objection should be taken upon the ground of the action being brought in the name of Mr. Hickman, who is a member of the Court of Foresters, and who, about four years ago, became insane, and has, ever since, been in the Littlemore Lunatic Asylum—the object really being to try the question "whether insanity is sickness within the meaning of the Friendly Societies Acts."

The defendants had paid the plaintiff a portion of the sick allowance up to last November, when, in consequence of a letter received by them from Mr. Tidd Pratt, the late Registrar of Friendly Societies, to the effect that insanity was not sickness within the meaning of the Friendly Societies Act, and that the trustees would not be justified in paying any portion of the funds to an insane member, the defendants discontinued payment.

Mr. W. T. C. Russell, solicitor (from the office of Merriam & Co., of Wallingford, and Queen-street, London), for the plaintiff, called attention to the second rule, which described the objects of the society to be "the rendering of pecuniary assistance to the members of the court when sick and not able to follow their usual employment," and also to the 24th rule, by which "a member who becomes sick, lame, blind or infirm and incapable of following his occupation should be entitled to his allowance," and contended that the word "infirmity," which, according to Walker's Dictionary, was interpreted "weakness of mind," would include "insanity." He further referred to the opinion given by Mr. Elliott a short time since at the Lambeth Police Court upon a similar point.

Mr. Dodd, solicitor, of Wallingford, for the defendant, referred to the Friendly Societies Acts to show that insanity was not within the scope of the objects declared by the Acts for which friendly societies might be formed.

Mr. WHIGHAM said that he must be bound by the rules in this case, and that he agreed with Mr. Elliott that "insanity" was "sickness" or infirmity. A question, however, as to whether the plaintiff's insanity was not caused by his own intemperance having been raised the case was adjourned for evidence on that point.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. Dowse, Q.C., has been appointed Solicitor-General for Ireland in the room of the Right Hon. C. R. Barry, promoted to be Attorney-General. Mr. Dowse is the only son of the late W. H. Dowse, Esq., of Dungannon, county Tyrone, by Maria, daughter of Hugh Donaldson, Esq. He was born in 1824, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; he was called to the bar in Ireland in Hilary Term, 1852, and was created a Queen's Counsel in February, 1863. He was returned for Londonderry, at the general election in November, 1868. Mr. Dowse's appointment as Solicitor-General will necessitate a new election for Londonderry, and if he should be successfully returned, the unusual spectacle will be represented of the inferior Law Officer for Ireland having a seat in the House, while his chief has none—the Attorney-General having failed to secure a seat since his defeat at Dungarvan, at the last general election, by Mr. Henry Matthews, Q.C.

Mr. HENRY CLARK, barrister-at-law, of the Western Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Tiverton, in succession to the late Mr. Richard Roope. The new recorder is the eldest son of the late Ewing Clark, Esq., of Efford Manor, near Plymouth, by Ann Letitia, third daughter of Paul Treby Treby, Esq., of Goodamoon and Plympton, Devonshire. Mr. Clark was born in 1829, and was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. He was called to the Bar at Lincoln's-inn in November 1855, and practised on the Western Circuit. Mr. Clark is the senior captain in the Royal Cornwall and Devon Miners' Artillery, to which he was appointed in April, 1861. He married, in 1852, Lucy, second daughter of the late John Carpenter, Esq., of Mount Tavy, Devon.

Mr. THOMAS LEWIS, solicitor, has been appointed Town Clerk of Tunbridge Wells. Mr. Lewis was formerly in the office of the Messrs. Harnson, solicitors, of Welshpool, and more recently served under Messrs. Scarth & Sprot, solicitors, of Shrewsbury.

Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM MAXTED, solicitor, of Lancaster, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Lancashire for the ensuing year; but the business of the shrievalty will be transacted by Messrs. Deacon & Wilson, of Preston. Mr. Maxted was certificated as an attorney in Michaelmas Term, 1810, and is a member of the Lancaster firm of Maxted & Gibson.

Mr. ISAAC EDWARD EVERETT, solicitor, of Hanley, in the Potteries, Staffordshire, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Worcestershire for the ensuing year; but the business of the shrievalty will be transacted by Messrs. Gillam & Sons, solicitors, of Foregate, Worcester.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—In their next three questions, the Judicature Commissioners refer to matters which are not of very great importance. They ask:—"15. Would it be expedient to give the right to pre-audience in the county courts to barristers? 16. Would it be expedient to make any and what alterations in the provisions of the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, s. 10, which limits the right of solicitors to act as advocates in the county courts? 17. Have the present restrictions had any, and what effect upon the class of solicitors practising in the county courts?"

The object alluded to in the first of these questions has been very pertinaciously kept in view by the junior members of the Bar. In 1855 the supposed advantage of pre-audience for barristers was brought under the notice of the County Court Commissioners, but it failed to produce on those learned gentlemen the desired impression. Since then the matter has been mooted constantly, with a view to legislation, and now, as the Judicature Commissioners have made it one of their special questions, I am led to suppose that it may possibly be regarded with favour by some members of that body. In fact, however, when rightly understood, the query can only be answered in the negative. If the point were simply this, whether, in making motions, when the advocates alone attend the court, barristers, as members of the higher branch of the profession, should have the right of being heard before attorneys, I should not have a word to say in opposition to such an arrangement; for, first, it would be in strict analogy with the rule which prevails at Westminster, when motions are heard by the Court in Banc, and which gives pre-audience to Queen's counsel over members of the outer bar; and next, it would be in accordance with the 57th rule of the New Orders in Bankruptcy, which specially provides that, "except in cases of emergency, all motions shall be made and heard in the order in which they are set down, at the sitting of the Court, but motions by the bar shall be heard in precedence to those by attorneys."

But the short and decisive answer to all this is, that, in the county courts, there are, practically speaking, no motions. Occasionally, indeed, there may be an application to change the venue, or to postpone the trial, of a cause, or to fix a particular hour for the hearing, but these matters are seldom entrusted to advocates, and when they are the Court disposes of them in a minute or two. Motions for new trials, or to vary, suspend, or set aside orders, are not common, and—speaking, I am sorry to say, with the experience of more than three lustra—I do not think they average two per day, in a large court. The idea, therefore, of marshalling these motions would be merely ridiculous, and indeed, such is not the object of those who promote the movement. What they wish to see established is a rule that every cause in which counsel is engaged, should, out of special compliment to the bar, be taken out of its turn, and that the convenience of suitors and witnesses, as well as of solicitors, should be postponed to theirs. Nakedly stated in this manner, a pretension more impolite, and less in unison with the feelings of the age could hardly be put forward. What would the "stuff gowns" themselves think of a rule which should give pre-audience on circuit and at Nisi Prius to those who "rustle in silk?" But, quite apart from any professional question, would the public submit to such a rule for a single hour? I am almost ashamed to remind the Commissioners that Courts of Justice are for suitors and not for lawyers, and that the principal duty of a judge, next to deciding justly, is to consult, without favour or affection, the convenience of the litigants. We shall find in Magna Charta not only "Nulli negabimus" but also "Nulli differemus"—"justitiam;" and how can this cardinal principle be upheld, if a suitor who does not employ counsel, is to have the trial of his cause put off to "a more convenient season," while another can get his dispute disposed of out of its turn, simply because he has retained a barrister?

In 1852 the Legislature expressly enacted, that in the county courts barristers should have no "right of exclusive or pre-Audience" (see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, s. 10); and although I have sufficient esprit de corps to be anxious to advance the interests of my younger brethren at the bar, I cannot for their sake consent to sacrifice the rights of the suitors, and I am bound to express a decided opinion in favour of the existing rule.

With the view of rendering more clear what I have to say on the next two questions, I think it convenient to place in juxtaposition, the enactment on the subject as it stood in the original County Court Act of 1846, and the substituted law which is contained in the Act of 1852. The first statute enacted in substance, that no person should be entitled to appear for any other party in the county court, unless he were an attorney, or a barrister instructed by such attorney on behalf of the party, or, some person specially allowed by the judge to appear; and the judge might even have withheld his consent to any one arguing a question as counsel for a suitor, whether he were a barrister, an attorney or any other person. These provisions were remarkable in three respects; for first, an attorney might have been heard in a county court, whether he were directly retained by a suitor or not; next, a barrister could only have been heard when instructed by an attorney; and lastly, the Court was entrusted with the large discretionary power of "shutting up" any offensive advocate.

The interests of the Bar were certainly not much consulted by these arrangements, and, no doubt, the promoters of the county court system acted as they did with malice prepense. In truth, they were somewhat afraid of a profession, some of the members of which, like the heathen of old, seemed "to think that they would be heard by their much speaking," and it was feared that, if these gentlemen were allowed full scope, it would not be easy to administer justice either cheaply or with speed. The experience of six years proved that such misgivings were unfounded, and the pendulum of legislative opinion, as is usual in these cases, swung rather too much in an opposite direction. Section 10 of the Act 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54 introduced changes which could not have better served the interests of the bar had they been drawn up by an attorney-general. That enactment, stripped of legislative tautology, amounts to this, that any party to a suit, or any attorney "acting generally in the action, but not an attorney retained as an advocate by such first-mentioned attorney, "or a barrister," retained by or on behalf of the party on either side," but without pre-audience, or, by leave of the judge, any other person, may address the Court, subject to the judge's regulations for the orderly transaction of business. With the single exception of the coveted pre-audience, the Bar, in these clauses, have had it all their own way. The judges are bound to hear them, however prolix or troublesome they may be; they are entitled, for the first time, to advocate causes without the intervention of an attorney, and a heavy blow has been levelled at the rising class of "advocate attorneys."

The question now asked by the Commissioners is, whether the attorneys have been quite fairly treated in these changes, and I am clearly of opinion that they have not. I have no objection to the rule which enables suitors in the county courts to retain counsel for themselves, and thus to avoid the additional expense of employing attorneys as middlemen. Few of the questions tried in those courts are of sufficient importance to bear the double costs of consulting two legal advisers; and the change in question has doubtless served the twofold object, of promoting the interests of the suitors, as well as those of the Bar. But just because I am prepared to make this avowal, I must, in common justice, speak out in favour of the advocate attorney. He will frequently go into court upon easier terms than a barrister, and consequently his employment is a saving of expense. He is often—I write it in pale ink—as able an advocate as his elder brother at the Bar, and from confining his attendance to some few special courts, he usually knows, better than a stranger counsel, the idiosyncrasies of the judge he addresses, and the general practice of the Court. Then why should he not be employed? If a merchant is entangled in a law-suit at Liverpool, he retains his local attorney to protect his interests. This attorney, as a matter of course, and without consulting his client, transacts all the London business of the cause through his London agent. Nobody complains of such a practice, and without it the legal machine would come to a dead lock. But in what does this practice differ from that of a family solicitor, who, like the Jewish lawgiver, though very wise, is "slow of speech and of a slow tongue," and who, when instructed to defend a cause, for a valued client, in the county court, wishes to have the right of handing the papers to some young advocate attorney of known ability? Surely it would be wiser to allow him to act thus, rather than to force him to adopt the alternative of either sending his client dissatisfied away, or of saddling him with a needless bill of costs, in the preparation of a formal brief and the instruction of counsel.

I have hitherto treated the clause in question as if it were still in full force; but, to speak the truth, it now rather raises a question of feeling than one of practical value. During the last fifteen years I cannot recal to mind a single instance in which it has been brought under my notice, yet I am confident that it is set at nought almost systematically. In fact, the law can be so easily evaded, by simply getting the suitor to sign a paper retaining the services of the advocate attorney, that it would be next to impossible to enforce the enactment on a large scale; and the only effect of keeping it on the statute-book any longer will be, to hurt the susceptibilities of an honourable and most useful body of men.

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

STAMPS ON LEASES.

Sir,—The decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Boulton v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue appears to me to raise a further question as to the sufficiency of stamps on deeds. By the schedule to 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, a duplicate or counterpart of any deed or instrument chargeable with stamp duty is charged—"where such stamp duty or duties chargeable (exclusive of progressive duty) shall not amount to the sum of five shillings—the same duty or duties as shall be chargeable on the original deed," &c. Mr. Vacher in his "Stamp Duties Digest" makes the above read "Where the principal duty chargeable, &c." If this be a correct reading then the question arises, which is the principal duty on a lease bearing a sixpenny ad val. stamp, and a thirty-five shilling as a deed not otherwise charged. I should urge that as the lease is the principal document, therefore the sixpenny stamp is the principal duty, for the covenants are only accessories, and inserted to secure the landlord's rent. If this argument holds good the counterpart is only liable to a sixpenny duty, but if, on the other hand, the thirty-five shilling stamp is held to be the principal duty, then the counterpart is rendered liable to a five shilling stamp. I should like to have the opinion of some of your correspondents hereon.

Should not some steps be taken by the profession to bring a bill forward in the coming session of Parliament to do away with the anomaly created by this decision?

The following figures will show that the decision creates an anomaly, particularly in my district, where long leases are the usual mode of dealing between owners and small purchasers. A lease is granted without premium and containing covenants to erect buildings at an annual rent of £2 10 for a term of 999 years; the duties payable thereon are as follows:—Ad valorem 6s., lease not otherwise charged 35s., counterpart 5s., total 46s. This ground-rent represents the value of the land from which it issues and if sold would at twenty years' purchase produce £40, the ad valorem duty upon which is 5s. Therefore, the duty chargeable upon the instrument creating a finite term is over 500 per cent. in excess of the duty chargeable upon a deed by which the fee simple is itself conveyed.

LESSON.

[The word "principal" in the Digest referred to was probably intended with reference merely to progressive duty. We fear that the phrase "the same duty or duties as shall be chargeable on the original instrument" must be taken to include a duty as for a "lease not otherwise charged."—Ed. S. J.]

THE IRISH LANDED ESTATES COURT.

Sir,—In your article this week on the case of Lanesborough v. Reilly, you forcibly point out that if lands which have never been brought within the jurisdiction of the Landed Estates Court, may be taken away from their owner merely because, through the fraud or carelessness of a clerk, they have been included in a conveyance signed by the judge, no landed property in Ireland is really secure, not even if purchased yesterday in the Landed Estates Court. It seems to me doubtful whether the powers of the Court could be limited to lands brought formally under their jurisdiction without defeating the main object of the system, viz., to relieve subsequent purchasers from the necessity of going further back than the conveyance signed by the judge; but the risk to all owners of landed property, from the conclusive effect given to any conveyance executed by the judge, is far from imaginary. The repeated frauds perpetrated upon public companies, and in some cases upon the Government during the last few years, show that no system is a sufficient security without personal vigilance, and it is not to be expected that the future judges of the Landed Estates Court, appointed, as they probably will be, partly on political or personal grounds, will always be accurate and vigilant men of business.

The remedy I would suggest is the formation of an assurance fund out of which all losses occasioned by the frauds or mistakes of the employees of the Court may be made good. In South Australia, under Mr. Torrens' Act, such an assurance fund has been formed by levying an ad valorem tax of one halfpenny in the pound on the value of all land brought under the system (see Laws of South Australia, 24 & 25 Vict. No. 22, ss. 28 and 131). A simpler course which I should have placed first, but for fearing that it might be rejected on constitutional grounds, would be for the State to undertake the responsibility of making good any losses from fraud or mistake, just as the Bank of England does with reference to transfers of stock, and to secure itself against loss by levying a small ad valorem tax on the lands which pass through the Court. Such a tax would be only a slight addition to the expenses of sale or registration, while even a single case of land taken away from the real owner by the Landed Estates Court, if left uncompensated, may constitute a serious grievance because concentrated upon an individual.

A FAIR RING AND NO FAVOUR.

Sir,—An article in the Saturday Review on "The Judiciary Commission" tempts me to renew a correspondence which appears to have become languid in your columns, on the subject of the anticipated fusion between the Bar and the solicitors. Your contemporary asserts that the Chancery Amendment Act, 1852, has broken down, and that the chief clerks, like the old masters in chancery, are merely "journeyman judges" who have not sufficient assistance from their masters in the craft, the vice-chancellors.

The writer says, with truth, that legal points of the gravest kind have to be decided by the chief clerks, and suggests an increase to the Bench that there may be more satisfactory judicial work done in chambers.

Avoiding a long letter on the subject, and not denying the need for more judges, I submit the query for consideration of your readers, whether that which is evil in the practice at chambers is not brought about, to some extent, by the system which prevents the solicitors, who are allowed to argue before a judge in a private room, from being heard by the same authority in open court.

Reports of proceedings in chambers are frequently to be seen in the newspapers, from which it may be inferred that the administration of justice in secret is not the object in view of the present meaningless practice which drives our venerable judges, in all weathers, from the seat of justice in one building to continue their duties in another.

Mr. G. H. Moore moved, and Mr. H. Matthews seconded, an amendment, that a committee be appointed to examine the precedents and law of Parliament in this case, and to report to the House as to the steps which ought to be taken on the subject.

The motion was carried by 301 to 8.

Friendly Societies.—A bill by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was read a first time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer explained that its object was to abolish the Government interference with these societies. IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Thursday.

The long vacant Solicitor-Generalship has been at length filled up by the appointment of Mr. Dowse, M.P. for Derry. He was sworn in before the Lord Chancellor last evening. For many years his brilliant fancy and rough and ready repartee, combined with his intrepid straightforward mode of meeting legal difficulties, and untiring zeal for his client, have placed him among the first of our common law leaders, both at Nisi Prius and in court. His vigorous, genial character are here thoroughly appreciated, and make his appointment a popular one even with those whose friends were "in the running" for the post. His election is opposed by Mr. Robert Baxter, of the firm of Baxter, Rose, Norton & Co.

An important meeting of the Irish Bar took place in the Library, Four Courts, on Saturday last, for the purpose of receiving from the committee of the Bar, previously appointed for the purpose, an account of the result of the communications with the benchers of the Honourable Society of King's Inns with reference to the representation of the Bar upon that body. Of the forty-six members of the bench, the present number of barristers, excluding the three serjeants and the law officers of the Crown, is but ten, and, with the exception of seventeen ex officio members, all the new benchers are chosen by the existing body.

The Bar ask that the original constitution of the body, providing that the majority of the body should consist of members of the practising Bar, should be restored in substantial accordance with the charter of 1793. The benchers, though yielding to some of the wishes of the Bar, have refused to concede this point, which would practically revolutionise the body as at present existing, and have declined to appoint a sub-committee to confer with the delegates of the Bar upon the matter.

Nearly all the leaders of the Bar who were not upon the original committee took part in the proceedings of the meeting, either proposing or seconding resolutions.

The tone of the meeting indicated a great anxiety to reopen negotiations with the benchers and to arrange matters amicably between the two bodies, but not the less a determination to have the matter disposed of by the Legislature in case the benchers were unwilling to move farther in it.

LAW OF PRIMOGENITURE.*

Amongst the various laws of our country, none have descended to our own time in a better state of preservation than those regulating our law of primogeniture.

As it is one amongst the number of interesting subjects for discussion at this meeting, a portion of our time may doubtless be profitably devoted to its consideration. We have, especially of late, observed that the subject is one frequently debated beyond the precincts of legal circles. My object will be, within the compass of the few minutes devoted to this paper, to say a few words in favour of the law of primogeniture.

If any law be entitled to respect by reason of its antiquity, and also for having contributed to the general prosperity and dignity of a country, it appears to me that our law regulating the descent of real property is fully entitled to our greatest respect.

In Blackstone's chapter of Title by Descent we read as follows:

"This right of primogeniture in males seems antiently to have only obtained among the Jews, in whose constitution the eldest son had a double portion of the inheritance, in the same manner as with us, by the laws of King Henry the First, the eldest son had the capital fee or principal feud of his father's possessions and no other pre-eminence; and as the eldest daughter had afterwards the principal mansion when the estate descended in coparcenary. The Greeks, the Romans, the Britons, the Saxons, and even originally the Feudists, divided the lands equally, some among all the children at large, some among the males only. But when the emperors began to create honorary feuds or titles of nobility, it was found necessary, in order to preserve their dignity, to make them impartible, or, as they styled them, feuda individua, and in consequence descendible to the eldest son alone. This example was further enforced by the inconveniences that attended the splitting of estates—namely, the division of the military services, the multitude of infant tenants incapable of performing any duty; the consequential weakening of the strength of the kingdom; and the inducing younger sons to take up with idleness and idleness of a country life, instead of being serviceable to themselves and the public by engaging in mercantile, in military, in civil, or in ecclesiastical employments. These reasons occasioned an almost total change in the method of feudal inheritances abroad, so that the eldest males began universally to succeed to the whole of the lands; in all military tenures; and in this condition the feudal constitution was established in England by William the Conqueror.

Yet we find that socage estates frequently descended to all the sons equally, so lately as when Glanville wrote in the Reign of Henry the Second; and it is mentioned in the Mirror, as a part of our ancient constitution, that the knight's fees should descend to the eldest son, and socage fees should be partible among the male children. However, in Henry the Third's time we find by Bracton, that socage lands, in imitation of lands in chivalry, had almost entirely fallen into the right of succession by primogeniture, as the law now stands, except in Kent, where they gloried in the preservation of their ancient gavel-kind tenure, of which a principal branch was the joint inheritance of all the sons, and, except in some particular manors and townships, where their local customs continued the descent, sometimes to the youngest son only, or in other more singular modes of succession."

The black letter book entitled "The Dyaloges in Englishe betweene a Doctour of Divinitie and a student in the Lawes of England," says (in modernised spelling), "The eldest son shall have and enjoy his father's lands at the common law in conscience as he shall in the law. And in Borough English the younger son shall enjoy the inheritance, and that in conscience. And in Gavelkind all the sons shall inherit the land, together as daughters at the common law, and that in conscience. And there can be none other cause assigned why conscience in the first case is with the eldest brother, and in the second with the younger brother, and in the third case with all the brethren. But because the law of England, by reason of divers customs doth sometime give the land wholly to the eldest son, sometime to the youngest, and sometime to all."

It appears to be rather singular that the military condition of the country in early time produced a system of tenure, which many centuries later became admirably adapted to our social condition, even long after the abolition of the ancient military tenure.

In early time, no doubt the eldest son succeeded to the whole estate, leaving the widow and the younger children totally unprovided for. This is primogeniture pure and simple.

But this state of things was too unsophisticated to last for any great length of time. It would soon become a necessity to make some provision for the widow and the younger children. Then gradually progressed the system of conveyancing, and the settlement and entail of estates, and these are so interwoven in our law of primogeniture that they have become an integral part of it, and cannot very conveniently be separated from it.

The French consider our law one of great hardship, they seem to overflow with pity for our poor younger children, and with all our national honour, and the position and wealth we have acquired, they consider we have failed in discharging one of the grand rules of parental duty. In this they are in error, but presuming that they were right, it is quite clear that we should hardly apply to France to teach us this one out of many lessons we may have yet to learn.

Were that country to make inquiry they would soon ascertain that we were more just than they had given us credit for. And that coupled with our provision for the first-born, we granted incomes for widows and maintenance for younger children out of estates supposed to be laid hold of by eldest sons perfectly free and unfettered.

Now, as to the alleged hardship of primogeniture, we are all acquainted with the usual provisions contained in a family settlement of considerable landed estate—viz., an annuity to the wife commonly called pin-money, then a jointure annuity to her in case she be left a widow, and subject thereto a trust to raise a sum of money (regulated by the value of the estate) for younger children's portions, male and female; then a limitation to the first and other sons in tail male, remainder to the daughters in tail general, and in default of issue to the settlor in fee. This apparently complicated legal web may be easily broken through by the aid of an Act passed in 1834, whereby the tenant in tail, with the consent of the protect^{ors} of the settlement, may by an enrolled assurance at once destroy the entail and deal with the property in any way they may think fit. Thus in reality the so-called hardship does not extend beyond an idea.

It is to be observed that the question as to the abolition of our law of primogeniture is principally confined to a class of agitators who wish the change ostensibly for parties whom they consider to be dealt with unjustly by the law, but really to break down the power of the aristocracy; one of their favourite arguments being a fallacious one—viz., that the eldest son having succeeded to the estate, the younger children are all thrown upon the country to be maintained by the taxation of the people. Thus the cause obtains sympathy, and after frequent agitation it may perhaps be raised to the dignity of a great public question. It appears that (inter alia) the lawyers ought to make a firm stand against any encroachment upon our present law, for, primogeniture being abolished, the laws regulating the settlement and entail of estates would not be expected long to survive. The splitting up of land into infinitesimal portions might increase the number of small conveyances, but it is to be hoped that the lawyers as a body would not barter the dignity of the country for pecuniary gain.

The principal argument for the abolition of the law is that the present system is mainly adapted for keeping up the social position of a few great families, and that the effect thereof is so pernicious that capital is kept away from the soil, and it is therefore neither properly cultivated nor improved. The latter part of this argument is not true, and to give but an outline of the improvements in agriculture within the last twenty-five years would form the subject of a very long lecture. Drainage operations have been carried on most generally and extensively, and the application of steam and improved machinery to farms is a marvel to the cultivator of a bygone generation.

A visit to an agricultural show is quite sufficient to convince anyone that capital is by no means kept away from the soil. As to the objection that the present system keeps up the position of a few great families. Well, suppose this to be so—it is not stated by any of the opponents of the law that those families, or the heads of them, exercise their position tyrannically or in any way unjustly.

Countries with their intense desire for change (France for instance) which in the fifty-nine years prior to 1819 had not less than two and twenty resolutions and constitutions swept away—the law to which we have so long and firmly adhered—for it is one that if parted with can not easily be recovered. Our property law springing from a barbarous age, and progressing step by step through the days of the Saxons, passing the Norman Conquest, and receiving the successive improvements of more enlightened times, now appears in our own day as one of the great social bulwarks of liberty the framers of our constitution have been careful to preserve. Having thus received it in so good a state let us endeavour to hand it down to posterity in the same condition, and not as the faded emblem of former greatness.

The advocates of the abolition of our succession law make their demand upon the principle of justice to the younger children, but they fail to show that the persons in whose behalf they are so zealous have asked for any change in the law. It may be said that no matter what laws we enact the main classes of society are so firmly fixed that they cannot be moved, and that the affairs of the country will go on quite as well as heretofore. Do not let us be too sure of that. The acts and deeds of the great families of our land are before us, and we feel confidence in their future proceedings. Presuming them, however, to decline and fall, to what body or class of men could we trust the power wielded by the race we were parties to destroy? One of the effects of a change in the law is predicted as a very beneficial one—viz., a reduction in the size of farms—a return to the imaginary days described by the poet "when every rood of ground maintained its man"—but anyone of the least practical skill in farming knows full well, that a man can do no good either to himself or his landlord in attempting to farm less than a certain prescribed number of acres.

That very small farms bode no good to anyone is now a maxim, but not one of our most recent, as appears on the high authority of Arthur Young, one of the most distinguished farmers and writers on farming in the reign of Geo. III. He carefully examined all our counties north and south, and, alluding in particular to Norfolk, "Great farms, said he, have been the soul of the Norfolk culture; split them into tenures of £100 a-year and you will find nothing in the whole county but beggars and weeds."

Our law of primogeniture, originally springing from custom, has become so consolidated and interwoven in the constitution of the country that any material interference with it would alter the balance of power in the various classes of society, and destroy the results of the legislation of centuries; it cannot be for the benefit of the community to destroy or materially weaken the power of the great country party, of whom we feel so proud, and from whom mainly spring our members of Parliament, justices of the peace, clergy, officers of the army, and naval commanders, eminent writers, and also the heroic race of men who have carried the English name and fame to the remotest regions of the earth, who have established colonies, and given us the Indian empire.

We have yet to learn why our landed aristocracy should summarily be called upon to surrender their position; they enjoy no special privileges beyond the rest of the community; in every respect they cheerfully submit to equal laws and an equal taxation.

The great landed proprietors of our country are in fact the true friends of the people, and in any great commercial or other national public calamity they are the first to give freely both time and money to the alleviation of distress. They lead subscriptions in aid of our charitable and benevolent institutions. They fill honorary and other positions which often require much time, labour, and ability in their local organisation and sustenance, also as justices of the peace they discharge efficiently the duties of their office, and in all respects they exhibit a good example to the rest of the community.

Our ancient and most respectable law is attacked mainly because it is peculiar to England. If we have a peculiarity which is a superiority, may it not be well entitled to our support. Some persons have been pleased to dwell upon the subject of our national decadence, and they have pointed to the fallen splendour of Greece and Rome, and predicted that what has happened to those once celebrated countries will in like manner happen to us. If, however, we are not able to claim any special immunity from the accidents of other nations let us strive to keep off as long as possible the visitations of national evil, and as one of the means to that end let us endeavour to prevent the introduction of a law, demanded by no public or private exigency.

In a neighbouring country we have the advantage of knowing something about the operation of the law which certain parties are anxious to see introduced, and, although there may be some institutions which might be advantageously imported here from that country, still it is by no means perfectly clear that the law of real property can be included in the number.

It has been stated that the law of equal succession in France has been most injurious. It has caused great subdivision of property, kept agriculture back at a state of semi-barbarism, and produced a large population of agricultural paupers, discontented and miserable.

The law has signally failed in producing any one of the social advantages which its framers predicted and their dupes anticipated. The peasant proprietors, in the place of being independent and contented are, the immense majority of them, wretchedly poor and hopelessly involved in debt.

It was said that this equal succession law, by giving a large proportion of the population a stake in the country, would be a security against revolution and war. Of revolution it is quite needless to speak. And as to war, the multitudes of peasant proprietors would gladly abandon their petty holdings at the first blast of the trumpet, exchanging a life of monotonous penury for the excitement of the field and the comparative comfort of the camp.

Considered in a general point of view, the French law of succession seems to have all the disadvantages of perpetua entails with none of their advantages. By interfering so much with the disposal of a man's property it weakens the motives to accumulation, while, by rendering the children in great measure independent, it weakens the parental authority; the children of those who have any property are aware, from their earliest years, that, whether they deserve it or not, it must be parcelled out amongst them. And can anyone doubt that this certainly contributes to paralyse their efforts, and render them less enterprising and less dutiful than they would have been had their condition depended principally on themselves, and they had known they had no claim other than their own deserts on their parents?

Much more to the same purport might be quoted, but this will suffice.

There is a great weight of legal authority in favour of our law, but a short paragraph from the first Report of the Real Property Commissioners is commended to the attention of all parties of the opposition: it is this—"The owner of the soil is, we think, invested with exactly the dominion and power of disposition over it required for the public good, and landed property in England is admirably made to answer all the purposes to which it is applicable. A testamentary power is given which stimulates industry and encourages accumulation, and, while capricious limitations are restrained, property is allowed to be moulded according to the circumstances and wants of every family."

It is a subject of great congratulation to know that high praise was accorded to our law by a Frenchman named Cottu, who occupied a high legal position in his own country, and was in 1820 sent over by the French Government to observe and report upon the working of some of our laws. He paid particular attention to our law of primogeniture and to our criminal law, and that he might gain a practical knowledge of those subjects, he went the Northern Circuit, and formed the friendship of the leading counsel from whom, as well as the judges, he received all the attention and assistance he required, the result of his observations was published in a work entitled "The administration of Criminal Justice in England, and the Spirit of the English Government," from which the following extracts are made—after mentioning his esteem of the English he proceeds:—

"This esteem has been the result of my strong conviction that this people has carried further than any other the science of true liberty, and the social virtues necessary for its maintenance.

"Land is not equally divided in England as it is in France amongst all the children of a family. Most of the large estates are entailed, and in all classes of society, from the lord down to the most humble citizen, the law gives to the eldest son all the real estate of an inheritance, and does not divide it amongst the other children as in the case of personal estate. Truly the law grants to the parents the unlimited power of disposing of the whole of their lands, just as they may think fit, but it is very seldom they practice this right of equalising the division, and although it may be difficult to measure in a precise manner the portion of the younger sons, still it is always much inferior to that of the eldest son.

"Thus the customs of the nation, far from being in contradiction to the law are on the contrary conformable to its spirit; and in every family, the principle of the inequality of the division of the granting to the eldest son almost the whole of the real property is irrevocably perpetuated.

"This law and these customs are fertile in great results, the most important of all is the attachment of each family not only to its property, but even still more to the district in which it is situated, and this attachment becomes sometimes a sentiment so lively, and, so to speak, so religious, that there exist a large number of estates belonging to the same families from the time of the Conquest. Each is anxious to adorn and improve his estate which he knows is to descend to his latest posterity. Thus there are no country seats presenting so delightful a prospect as those of England. All have parks maintained with the greatest care, and animated by the lively movements of a multitude of domestic animals who graze at liberty. Each proprietor takes the same care of his garden as he does of his house, and would be ashamed if a stranger saw it in a slovenly condition. The eye of the master has always the same watchfulness, because the master never becomes obsolete. When age begins to cause him to be indifferent to the attractions of this world and to the pleasures conferred by his property, and when his earthly career closes, he is replaced by his eldest son, whose youth attaches him close to the world, and who called to the next possession of the family estate, displays in its administration a vigilance still more active and complete than that of his father.

"It is not, however, solely to this order of succession that we must attribute the habits of the English in passing on their estates the greatest part of the year, since in the provinces of France where this same order of succession was formerly established, the owners were not less in the habit of shutting themselves up in the towns, and of there establishing the principal seat of their affairs. This custom is likewise the result of all their municipal institutions, which confers upon the principal residents in each county, not only the almost total administration of the district, but also the establishment, the apportionment and employment of a large part of the taxes, the maintenance of public peace, and the administration of justice.

"The English nobility has then that in particular, the titles and prerogatives it enjoys belonging to her, less as a patrimony and family property, but more as a kind of concession granted to it by the nation for the general good, and with the only desire of creating a worthy power, as much against the excesses of the democratic spirit as against the encroachments of arbitrary power.

"Let us associate with, let us study the English, if we wish to learn liberty, and we shall soon come to the conclusion of being delighted with them."

LAW ASSOCIATION FOR THE BENEFIT OF WIDOWS AND FAMILIES OF PROFESSIONAL MEN IN THE METROPOLIS AND VICINITY.

At the usual monthly meeting held at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society in Chancery-lane on Thursday, the 3rd inst., the following directors being present, Mr. Desborough (Chairman), Mr. Harding, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Few, Mr. Burton, Mr. Collisson, Mr. Hedger, Mr. Kelly, Mr. Nisbet, Mr. Rackham, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Sawtell, Mr. Sidney Smith, Mr. Tylee, Mr. Whyte, and Mr. Boodle (Secretary), the business of the society was transacted, and two new members were elected.

LAW STUDENTS DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society held on the 8th inst., Mr. Herbert in the chair, the following question was discussed. "A, a member of a limited company, is adjudicated bankrupt, and shortly afterwards a petition is presented against the company, under which it is ordered to be wound up. Is A. liable to be made a contributory in respect of his shares not fully paid up, the assignee not having elected to take the shares?" Mr. Groves opened the debate in the affirmative, and he was followed by thirteen other speakers. Upon the question being put to the society the votes of the members present were equal on either side, but the chairman gave his casting vote in favour of the affirmative. The number of members present was twenty-four.

[The Lords Justices decided in Hastie's case (17 W. R. 302), affirming the Master of the Rolls, that where the bankruptcy precedes the winding-up and the assignee repudiates the shares, which remain in the bankrupt's name, he is liable for the future calls. Scus if the winding up preceded the bankruptcy (Morton's case 17 W. R. 606.) Ed. S. J.]

LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

The forty-sixth annual general meeting of the proprietors of this society, was held on the 2nd inst. Francis Thomas Bircham, Esq., occupied the chair.

Mr. GRIFFITH DAVIES, the actuary, having read the report of the directors,

The CHAIRMAN moved that the report be received and adopted, and observed that the chair in that society fell to the directors in rotation, and consequently the humblest amongst them, when his turn came, drifted into his occupancy. He was surprised that a like course was not adopted in other societies, as it gave to each of the directors an opportunity of not being behind his colleagues in his knowledge of the affairs of the Society when it came to his turn to preside. It was more interesting to shareholders on such occasions to be informed of the amount of dividend to be declared, and it would be satisfactory to them to know that they were going to receive the same dividend they had done during the present quinquennial period, and the same bonus as during the last two years. It amounted to 72s. per share, and when they recollected that only £10 had been paid upon each share this would be at the rate of 36 per cent. Altogether there would, on the present occasion, be a dividend of 75 per cent. It was interesting to observe how the balance of the assurance fund shewed in comparison with that of last year. At the end of the first of the quinquennial period the balance was £4,340,209, while at the end of 1869 it was £4,586,873, being an increase of £246,564, and which shewed to all that the quinquennial period had been a satisfactory one. It might be considered that, with £246,000 of the assurance fund, other items might be brought to shew that this was not all that was necessary on which to found an inference of prosperity. It might be thought that the claims were less than the ordinary average during the last five years; but when they looked at the facts they would see this was not the case. During the quinquennial period now ending the claims had reached an average of £369,934, while, during the quinquennial period ending 1864, they had been £342,500. To the end of 1869, however, the claims paid were above the average, being £391,380. So by a number of young lives falling in, and old ones standing over, the increment was aggravated by that rather than by any other cause. But it would be seen that there was nothing to shew that it interfered with the increment of £246,000. At the end of the quinquennial period of 1864 the figures were also £246,000; it was a curious and interesting fact, and shewed that they were able to carry over to the guarantee fund, and divide among the shareholders a good amount of profits. There were other matters to which he would refer, which during the autumn of the past year, had been brought under notice by public discussion in the press upon Life Assurance, and many valuable comments had been made upon the subject. In the Globe newspaper a table had appeared which entitled the proprietors of that journal to the gratitude of the assurance world. It brought together facts showing what was being done in the principal assurance offices. One column showed the amount of accumulated funds of each society—of which he believed there were about sixty—and in that table it was set forth that the accumulated capital of the Law Life was five and a quarter millions; and none of the other offices came up to that. He thought that would be nothing in itself if the liabilities of their society were greater than those of other offices, but the table showed that the liabilities of other offices were much in excess of those of the Law Life, so their liabilities and accumulated funds stood in happy juxtaposition in that table. Another test in that paper was that it seemed to affect the actuarial mind favourably if the reserve fund made a large multiple of the income; and, taking it for what it was worth, that office stood in the first three—that was their reserve fund was a greater multiple of premium income than any of the other offices except two in that table. But a more important item was the rate of the expense of conducting the business of their society; and it was with greater satisfaction that he referred to this table as an independent source. They found that their expenses were 7½ per cent. upon the premium income, while in other offices the expense was double that, and more than one treble. The table showed that the expenses of the Law Life for management was the lowest of the commission paying offices, and as low, after taking off the commission, as any of the non-commission paying offices. Including commission their cost of management was 7½ per cent., and excluding commission 3½ per cent., the cost of management on the total income being 4 per cent. They made out most elaborate calculations at the time of ascertaining the quinquennial bonus, and obtaining information respecting their liabilities which they were not prepared to give in August or any odd time, and therefore, not being able to give it accurately, they did not give it all; but when the calculations which were going on in the office were completed he believed they would come out as favourable or more favourable than any shown in this table. Some offices gave examples of the business in each particular class, the respective ages, the number of lives assured, other particulars, and to the public it supplied the only information worth having, and an opportunity of seeing how far an office was solvent, and which was likely to give a greater bonus to the assured; and he hoped his colleagues would endeavour to give as much information as they possibly could in that way when the bonus calculations are completed. When the proprietors found the large amounts which were standing to the credit of the society, he hoped they would believe that they had satisfactory security upon their investments. Their securities were within a few yards of that place, at Messrs. Hoare & Company's, over the way, and were regularly overhauled before occasions like the present. The Chairman then compared the new premiums income of 1868 with that of 1869, and said that the new policies in 1868 were 173 in number, with new premiums of something under £10,000; while in 1869 the number was 238, or 65 in excess, the new premium income secured by them being, in round numbers, £15,800; but which contained commuted premiums, or sums paid in a lump, at once and for all, to the extent of £3,700, so that the new premiums annually recurrent will be £12,000, which showed the new premium income to be satisfactory. The policies which came into the office were mainly due to the exertions of the directors. He did not say the proprietors were to blame if he did not distinguish as many coming in from the general body of the proprietors. He would ask any proprietor if in any other concern he could obtain more than 36 per cent. upon the paid-up part of his capital, and whether it would not be best to send policies to the Law Life, and pay himself a good percentage? It was to the interest of the proprietors to do so, but more so to the policyholders, when they considered that four-fifths of the profits were given back to them. It had been objected, when he had spoken to persons on the subject, that the Law Life was not a mutual office, but his answer always was that four-fifths of the profits of that office were better than five-fifths of the profits in some other offices, and he invariably found it a good argument where applied.

Mr. C. R. TURNER (Master of the Court of Queen's Bench), seconded the resolution, remarking that after the observations which had fallen from their Chairman it would be absurd for them to add anything.

A PROPRIETOR called attention to one advertisement issued by the society, giving the subscribed capital, total assets, &c., the form of which he considered calculated to mislead, and suggesting an alteration.

Another PROPRIETOR said he was satisfied that the directors were doing everything upon a correct principle, but he would ask, with interest accrued to the amount of £41,000, what advantage there was in holding back annually about £5,000 from the sum divided? As they were now upon the eve of the fifth quinquennial period, he would ask that in future the surplus of £5,000 might vanish.

A third gentleman required some information respecting the Connemara and Mayo estates, instancing the present unsettled state of Ireland, and the fact that the value of these estates did not appear in any way to be depreciated.

THE CHAIRMAN, in reply, said that all the items, with the exception of those relating to the Connemara estates, were the subject of actuarial valuation, and were stated in the report at the amounts shown in the books, and were within or under the amounts at which they might be realised. As to the sum of £5,000 being retained from the dividend, and not being exhausted, he could only say that the directors were always anxious, when they promised a dividend, to be sure of maintaining it, and endeavoured to be within the mark; but the money withheld was the property of the proprietors. The suggestion should, however, receive the consideration of the Board of Directors, as would also the subject of the advertisement.

The report and statement of accounts were then received and adopted, and the proceedings terminated.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

The Preliminary Examination in General Knowledge will take place on Wednesday, the 13th, and Thursday, the 14th July, 1870, and will comprise:—

1. Reading aloud a passage from some English author.
2. Writing from dictation.
3. English Grammar.
4. Writing a short English composition.
5. Arithmetic—A competent knowledge of the first four rules, simple and compound.
6. Geography of Europe and of the British Isles.
7. History—Questions on English History.
8. Latin—Elementary knowledge of Latin.
9. 1. Latin. 2. Greek, Ancient or Modern. 3. French.
4. German. 5. Spanish. 6. Italian.

The Special Examiners have selected the following books, in which candidates will be examined in the subjects numbered 9 at the Examination on the 13th and 14th July, 1870:—

In Latin . . . Sallust, Jugurtha; or, Horace, Odes, Book III.

In Greek . . . Euripides, Hecuba.

In Modern Greek Βιντοῦς 'Ιστορία τῆς Ἀμερικανικῆς Βαβυλῶνος.

In French . . . Fénelon, Les Aventures de Télémaque, Liv. I.—XII.; or, Voltaire:—1. La mort de César, and 2. Brutus.

In German . . . Goethe, Aus meinem Leben, Vol. I, Books I. II. III.; or, Schiller, Turandot.

In Spanish . . . Cervantes, Don Quixote, cap. xv. to xxx., both inclusive; or, Moratin, El Si de las Ninas.

In Italian . . . Manzoni's I Promessi Sposi, cap. i. to viii., both inclusive; or Tasso's Gerusalemme, 4. 5. and 6 cantos; and Volpe's Eton Italian Grammar.

With reference to the subjects numbered 9, each candidate will be examined in one language only, according to his selection. Candidates will have the choice of either of the above-mentioned works.

The examinations will be held at the Incorporated Law Society's Hall, Chancery-lane, London, and at some of the following Towns:—Birmingham, Brighton, Bristol, Cambridge, Cardiff, Carlisle, Carmarthen, Chester, Durham, Exeter, Lancaster, Leeds, Lincoln, Liverpool, Maidstone, Manchester, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Oxford, Plymouth, Salisbury, Shrewsbury, Swansea, Worcester, York.

Candidates are required by the Judges' Orders to give one calendar month's notice to the Incorporated Law Society, before the day appointed for the examination, of the language in which they propose to be examined, the place at which they wish to be examined, and their age and place of education. All notices should be addressed to the Secretary of the Incorporated Law Society, Chancery-lane, W.C.

LECTURES AND LAW CLASSES AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Mr. FITZROY KELLY, Lecturer and Reader on Equity—Monday, February 14, class A; Tuesday, February 15, class B; Wednesday, February 16, class C—4.30 to 6 p.m.

Mr. H. W. ELPHINSTONE, Lecturer and Reader on Conveyancing and the Law of Real Property—Friday, February 18—Lecture, 6 to 7 p.m.

The salary of the Town Clerk of Stockton has been advanced to £400 a-year.

The Ohio courts divorced 1,003 couples last year.—Albany Law Journal.

MR. WILLIAM RICHARDS, managing clerk for the firm of Freeth, Browne, and Rawson, solicitors, of Nottingham, died on the 30th January, at the age of sixty-seven years. He was the father of Mr. William Abraham Richards, solicitor, of Nottingham.

SUNDERLAND LAW SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of the attorneys and solicitors of Sunderland forming this society was held on the 29th January, at the Queen's Hotel, Sunderland. Mr. Alderman Ranson, president of the society, in the chair. The reports and accounts of the year showed a good balance in hand, and the society was in such a prosperous state that it was resolved to reduce the rate of subscription. Mr. R. T. Wilkinson, solicitor, was appointed president for the ensuing year, and Messrs J. Kidson and C. Smart members of the committee, to supply the yearly vacancies. In the evening about twenty members sat down to the annual dinner, Mr. Alderman Rose presiding, and Mr. Wilkinson occupying the vice-chair.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds opened with a little access of animation, consequent on a belief that the Government sales had ceased. They subsequently relapsed and became dull, and at the last have resumed their brisker tone, with a slight improvement in price. Railway traffic receipts are very favourable this week, in consequence of which the market opened strongly this day and prices advanced. Foreign securities are strong, this market being favourably influenced by the advices from Paris of a strong popular feeling in favour of the Government. The rascalities perpetrated in the matter of the Erie shares appear to continue in full swing; a telegram received in London on Wednesday announces that the transfer books are officially closed, without reason assigned, the reason, of course, being the desire to prevent the registration of the transfers sent out by the English Committee. The Times warns its readers that "the next democratic and popular candidate for the Presidency will be the politician by whom Messrs. Gould & Fisk were installed in permanent power." A bill is to be introduced for enabling the dividends on the funds to be paid quarterly, and for consolidating the new £3 per cent. and Reduced £3 per cents. with Consols.

CARRIAGE LICENCES.—The Times publishes the following case submitted by a coachbuilder to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue:—

QUESTIONS.

"1. If A. B. goes on January 1, 1870, to Messrs. P. and hires a brougham for six months, and, in addition to the hire, pays £2 2s. for the licence; if on the last of July he comes to Messrs. K. and desires to hire a brougham for six months, to December 31, he having returned the brougham to Messrs. P., are Messrs. K. to demand a further sum of £2 2s. in addition to hire, thus making the user pay £4 4s. per annum for his one carriage, or will Messrs. K. be justified in letting their carriage without tax on production of the licence for the year?"

2. Is a cipher or monogram painted on a carriage to be considered armorial bearings, and liable to a tax?

3. Coachmakers are often required to let a carriage for one day to accommodate customers who require an extra carriage for one day—say, for a wedding or races, or any occasional use—for which they pay 5s., or at most 7s. 6d., are the coachmakers who are disposed so to accommodate their customers liable for duty, £2 2s., for one day's use?

4. Are the carriages kept by coachmakers for short jobs—say, by month or week—to be subject to the full duty of £2 2s., or, as before, to half the ordinary duty?

5. Some customers having already made their returns, and in error having returned carriages hired of us as their own, and paid duty thereon, are we to return them, or may we accept their excise ticket as satisfactory?

6. Are we bound to give stamped receipts for £2 2s. paid for tax?"

ANSWERS.

"Inland Revenue, Somerset-house, London, Jan. 29, 1870.

Sir,—I am instructed by the Board to reply as follows to the questions forwarded with your letter of the 15th inst.:—

1. The hirer of a carriage is not liable for the licence duty in respect thereof. The person who lets a carriage is the person required to take out the licence for it; and in the case put by you Messrs. P. would be liable to duty for one carriage, and Messrs. K. for the other. A carriage let and returned may, however, be relet without a fresh licence being taken out for it in the same year.

2. Ciphers and monograms are not armorial bearings within the meaning of the Act.

3 and 4. A licence is required for every carriage let, even for a day, but the licence is available for the carriage for the whole year. The full duty is chargeable in all cases.

5. When the licence for a carriage has been taken out by the hirer in error, you should enter the carriage in your return, and state the name and address of the hirer, when inquiry will be made, and such directions as may be necessary will be given by the Commissioners in the matter, and, pending such inquiry, the Commissioners will not require the duty to be paid by you.

6. Every receipt given by you for a sum amounting to 40s. must be upon a stamp.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
W. M. ROSSETTI, Assistant-Secretary."

The Lord Chancellor has been petitioned to give to the Hartlepool the same County Court Admiralty jurisdiction as is at present given to Stockton, and for the county court judge to be allowed to try local bankruptcies there, instead of at Sunderland.

Mr. Thomas Lambert Mears, barrister-at-law, of the Inner Temple, has taken the degree of Doctor of Laws at the University of London. Mr. Mears was educated at King's College, London, and matriculated at the London University in June, 1865. He held the first place at the B.A. examination in 1865, and also at the LL.B. examination in the following year, when he was called to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, receiving the distinction of LL.B. in 1869.

The Albany (U.S.A.) Law Journal says:—The recent Congress of Lawyers in Germany suggests the necessity of a similar movement in this country. Although every state but one, and the general government also, derive their fundamental law from one source, we doubt if there is more diverse legislation among the different nations of Europe than among our several states. And this not merely concerning matters of local application, but about such as need not be influenced by time, circumstances, or place. The codes of law governing marriage and divorce are as numerous as the divisions of our territory, and conflict in their provisions one with all the rest. Some states favour marriage and almost prohibit divorce, some make marriage difficult and divorce easy, while others afford equal facility for both performances. Here, there should certainly be a uniformity in the law. Not less varied are the laws concerning the rights of married women. The usury laws differ one from another somewhat as the stars do. These are but single instances of an evil which the public to a certain extent comprehend, but which constantly embarrasses the practising lawyer. Most of the subjects of this conflicting legislation are exclusively under state jurisdiction. Left to themselves, the state legislatures will not remedy this evil, but will rather increase it. The only way in which it can be met seems to be by the united action of the bar of the whole country. If a convention could be held, similar in some respects to the German one, we believe that its suggestions in this direction would not only be listened to by our lawyers, but would be acted upon. Such a convention would be beneficial in other ways, both to the profession and the public.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 19, 1870.

THE TWO CASES OF Re National Provincial Life Insurance Society (Vice-Chancellor Malins) and Re Times Life Assurance and Guarantee Company (Vice-Chancellor James), reported in to-day's issue of the Weekly Reporter, contain most important decisions on the position of the amalgamated policyholders, and bear out, we are glad to say, the principle which we ventured to lay down many months ago, of recognition by the policyholders of the substituted liability of the amalgamated company. The judgment in the former case was delivered on the 28th of January last, and that in the latter on the 14th of the present month. Previously to these cases no decision had been given upon a policyholder's case, though the decision in the Family Endowment case, 18 W. R. 112, 266, had laid down a definite rule as to the case of an annuitant; and the observations of the Lord Chancellor in that case read very much as though his Lordship would have arrived at a similar decision in the case of a policy. As we have before observed, payment of premiums is in its nature far more indicative of recognition than acceptance of annuity; indeed a payee will usually accept payment from anyone offering to make it, while a person having to pay looks naturally to the character assumed by the party proposing to receive. In the case decided by Vice-Chancellor Malins premiums had been paid to the Albert for thirteen years. The Vice-Chancellor said that the policyholder "had looked to and paid the premiums to the Albert, and he (the Vice-Chancellor) considered that on every principle of common sense and justice the policyholder ought to have said that he did not like that office, and that the original assurers must settle with him before they transferred their business." In this case the policyholder had asked for a bonus from the Albert, and it was admitted that he knew the National Provincial had ceased business. The case was therefore very plain, but the remarks of the Vice-Chancellor, though perhaps extrajudicial, clearly show his view of the acquiescence question. The case before Vice-Chancellor James was a stronger case as against the policyholder, inasmuch as the deed of settlement of the Times Company contained a provision, of which, of course, the assured had notice, expressly contemplating the contingency of a transfer of the society's running policies. The Vice-Chancellor considered that there had been a complete novation, and that the policyholder had, with his eyes open, really accepted the Albert.

MR. KNOX GRANTED A SUMMONS last Saturday against the publisher of the Pall Mall Gazette, for an alleged libel on Mr. Dion Boucicault, contained in a letter published in that paper. The letter criticised severely Mr. Boucicault's style of writing, and then went on, "If he does not give us anything more attractive, it is probably because he has no opportunity of seeing better subjects. A writer of this school depends more than any other on the medium in which he lives." The author of the letter has since written to the Pall Mall Gazette to say that he only meant "that Mr. Boucicault, as a writer, so habitually resorted . . . to the vagabond and criminal classes, that he had come to view all life and society through this distorted medium."

The question thus raised is really one of construction. If the letter conveys a charge that Mr. Boucicault in fact lives in a medium of bad characters, it is a libel, but if it only refers to the world of imagination in which he lives as a writer, it falls within the rule which allows full comment on theatrical performances and other public entertainments. The line between criticism of a work and criticism of its author is clear and distinct, although critics are sometimes not sufficiently careful to observe it.

WE ARE GLAD TO SEE that the necessity for legislation on the stamp duties is being steadily pressed upon the Government. Last week we printed some extracts from a memorial presented to the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the Manchester Law Association. Since then another memorial has been presented by the Incorporated Law Society. A deputation from the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association attended at the same time, and presented another memorial upon the same subject. The memorial of the Incorporated Law Society, which is almost identical with that of the other society, after citing and explaining the provisions of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16, states:—

"That the memorialists believe that it was the intention of the Government who framed the Act that section 16, above quoted, should apply only to conveyances and deeds in the nature of conveyances, and not to leases, which were intended to be dealt with by the other sections above referred to.

"That the memorialists come to this conclusion for the following reasons:—

"1. Because the language of the first part of section 16 is clearly that used in Stamp Acts for describing conveyances and deeds of that character, and the annual sum referred to in the same part of the section is the expression used throughout the Act to designate a consideration by way of purchase money, payable in the form of an annuity or rent-charge; and although in the latter part of the section the words 'deed or instrument' are used, yet it is submitted that these words were used for brevity only, and that what was really intended was 'such deed or instrument'; and it may be inferred that it was not intended thereby to include leases, because the consideration referred to in this part of the section is confined, like the preceding part, to a 'sum of money yearly or in gross,' and the word 'rent' (always used in the Act when referring to leases) is not used.

"2. Because in the schedule, as well as in section 16, where conveyances or purchase deeds are referred to, the words 'annual sum' are used; whereas in the several places in the schedule and in section 23 where leases are referred to, the word 'rent' is always used, as it properly should be.

"3. Because the ad valorem on leases for terms of between thirty-five and one hundred years was understood to be expressly pointed at building leases, in which there is invariably a further consideration than that expressed by the rent; and it is evident that the ad valorem duty on such leases was by this Act made six times higher than the duty on other leases, in order to cover this further consideration.

"4. Because, if it had been intended to impose a new duty on so important and well-defined a class of deeds as building leases, it would have been done by express language, in its proper place in the schedule, and not by ambiguous and inferential language in the body of the Act, in a section apparently applicable to conveyances."

Then,—after observing that not only was this construction invariably adopted by the whole legal profession, down to the present time, but even the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and their legal advisers themselves, when called upon (under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, s. 14) formally to adjudicate (on the arising of some collateral point), have constantly decided that a lease, though containing a covenant to build or complete buildings, or though granted partly in consideration of the lessee having erected buildings, was only liable to an ad valorem duty on the rent and premium, if any,—the memorial submits that the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Boulton's case

"Was not in accordance with the intention of the framers of the Act, and that it is not just and equitable that the duties according to such construction should be enforced.

"That, according to the principle of the above decision, the judges may, and it is very probable, on the ground of logical consistency, that they will, at a future day hold that the ordinary covenants to repair, to insure, not to carry on particular trades, and other covenants usually inserted in leases, form such an additional valuable consideration as to render the 35s. stamp necessary; for all of these covenants constitute 'a further or other valuable consideration,' and have no express relation to the amount of rent or premium by which alone the ad valorem duty is to be regulated, and such a decision would render every lease in England granted since the Act of 1854 liable to a penalty. It is true that one of the judges, on the argument of Mr. Boulton's case, is reported to have intimated an opinion that a covenant to repair would not render the additional stamp necessary; but this, if it actually fell from the learned judge (which the memorialists are informed was not the case), was certainly not formally decided, and even if it were so decided it would be difficult in practice to determine the difference between a covenant to repair and a covenant to repair including alterations and additions; but inasmuch as the ordinary language of every lease is, that it is granted 'in consideration of the rents and covenants,' the memorialists submit that if the construction now put upon the 16th section of the above Act be followed to its legitimate conclusion, the non-liability to penalty of every existing lease must at best be doubtful.

"From the best information the memorialists have been able to obtain they believe that tens of thousands of building leases (to say nothing of rack-rent leases) have been granted since the Act of 1854, and stamped insufficiently according to the above decision; * and these leases are now in so many hands that it will be impossible, whatever publicity is given to the decision, to get them brought in to be stamped (a difficulty that is doubled by the existence in other hands of the counterparts), so that the objection will be constantly recurring upon titles for many years to come. Although, therefore, the Commissioners have intimated that they will at present affix to leases the additional stamp without any penalty, this will not remedy the evil, for the Commissioners cannot pledge future Governments, and more particularly so as they have no power actually to remit the penalties after the lapse of a year from the execution of the leases.

"The memorialists believe, therefore, that nothing short of an Act of indemnity (similar to section 10 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97) will relieve the public from the great mischief that has arisen, as the memorialists would most respectfully submit, from the vague language of an Act of Parliament."

And the memorial prays:—

"That her Majesty's Government may introduce into Parliament a bill to declare that no lease shall be deemed or taken to be improperly stamped by reason of the same not having been stamped in accordance with the requirements of section 16 of the said Act of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, and to relieve from penalties all persons who have not, so far as regards leases, complied with the terms of such section; and, also, either to repeal the latter part of such section, commencing with the words, 'And in case where any deed,' or to amend the same so as to render the same not applicable to leases. And that all duties paid in consequence of the decision in Boulton's case be refunded on application."

It is certain that the enactment in question, as now construed by the Court of Exchequer, is not in accordance with the intention of its framers, besides being most inconvenient and unjust in its operation; and as this is agreed on all sides, the matter will, we believe, be set to rights by legislation. We trust, however, that the session will not be allowed to pass over without a bill to consolidate the stamp laws.

* On inquiry of only ten solicitors' firms in London it has been ascertained that, since the Act of 1854, they have prepared upwards of 10,000 leases, the greater proportion of which have been building leases.

THE FRENCH COURT OF CASSATION, in March, 1869, decided, reversing a decision of the Imperial Court of Paris, that by virtue of the law of 23rd June, 1857, and subsequent diplomatic conventions made between France and England, English subjects may sue Frenchmen for counterfeiting their English trade-marks. We gave an account of this decision shortly after its publication.* In another case (Christy v. Daude) recently before the civil tribunal of Paris, the right of English subjects to have their trade-marks protected by the French courts has been again recognised. We take this opportunity of stating what many English traders will be glad to know, the circumstances under which English subjects are entitled to such protection.

In articles 5 and 6 the law of 1857 regulates the condition of foreigners generally as to their right to the protection of their trade-marks. All such aliens as possess in France manufacturing or commercial establishments are to enjoy the benefit of the law for all the wares of such establishments. Such aliens as do not possess establishments in France have no protection, unless there be between France and the nation to which they belong diplomatic conventions effecting reciprocity of protection.

This reciprocity was effected as to British subjects by Article 12 of the treaty of 23rd January, 1860. Whether they have or not establishments in France they are entitled in the same degree and manner as the subjects of that nation to prosecute in its courts all who, within its dominions, counterfeit their trade-marks, or wilfully sell articles bearing the spurious marks. But to claim that right they must comply with a requirement of the law which all, whether French or foreign subjects, must equally obey. Article 2 of the law enacts that "none can claim the exclusive property of a mark, unless he has deposited two representations thereof at the office of the clerk (greffe) of the Tribunal of Commerce of his domicile. For aliens having no domicile in France, the second paragraph of article 6 designates the Tribunal of Commerce of the Seine (that sitting in Paris) as the one where they should make their deposit. They may do so vicariously by power of attorney in the French language, properly legalised at the French Consulate, certified by the bearer, and registered in France by the fiscal authorities.

The deposit of the mark though necessary before the owner can defend his property, does not in itself constitute the appropriation of the mark. It is merely the mode of evidence prepared and required by the law for the proof of that appropriation. The deposit of a mark already used by other parties, though not registered by them, will confer on the depositor no right of property in that mark. And no retro-active effect is given to the deposit. The foreigner who has registered his trade-mark in France can prosecute only future, not previous piracies of the same. Indeed, there is authority to the effect that where the English mark has been usurped and actually used by French manufacturers previous to the deposit, that usurpation will create a right to the pirated mark in favour of the usurpers, and the English proprietor will be precluded from interfering with them. This is going, perhaps, somewhat too far, and possibly may not be confirmed.

The procedure generally followed begins by a seizure of the goods bearing the counterfeit marks, under an order obtained on an ex parte application by the aggrieved party. Where satisfactory evidence is possessed or can be procured without such a measure, it is better to dispense with a seizure, as, if the action goes against the plaintiff, and the seizure is in consequence avoided, damages will be given to the defendants. The suit may be brought either before the civil or the correctional tribunal. In the latter case, where the defendant is found guilty, he may be condemned to a fine and imprisonment.

* 13 S. J. 626.

IT IS RUMOURED that a measure will shortly be introduced into the House of Lords for erecting the Inns of Court into a legal university, of which the four inns will be the component colleges. Any scheme tending to make the Inns of Court really places of education can hardly fail to do good. In past centuries, in the days of the Stuart kings for instance, each Inn of Court, with its affiliated Inns of Chancery, was a law university of itself, carrying on an active system of education and much of the usual routine of university life, though with a somewhat less stringent discipline than that of Oxford or Cambridge. Thus the students were expected to attend "moots" and the readings of the readers, which corresponded somewhat to university "lectures;" there was daily dinner in Hall in term and out of term, and daily service in the Temple Church or the inn chapel, as the case might be, but the students do not appear to have been kept strictly to any attendance at chapel or any rules as to "gates." We find one of them, however, grumbling because the dinner hour in vacation was fixed in the Middle Temple at 10 a.m. A law university cannot, ex necessitate, maintain so strict a discipline as is maintained among the more boyish students of Oxford or Cambridge, but it may and should at least be an educational institution. And in that respect the scheme now spoken of would be only a return to the ancient usage.

WE ARE EXTREMELY GLAD to learn, from Mr. Ayrton's reply to Mr. Headlam in the House of Commons on the 11th ult., that the absurd idea of building the New Law Courts below the Strand, instead of on the old Carey-street site, has been finally abandoned.

IRREGULAR INDORSEMENTS OF BILLS AND NOTES.

The American Law Register for November, 1869, contains a report of a case of Schafer v. The Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Easton, decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania upon a point which seems to have been more often mooted in America than in England—viz., What is the effect of the indorsement of a promissory note by a person not otherwise a party to it? The circumstances of the case were these:—B. made a note payable to the order of J.; S. indorsed it; afterwards J. indorsed it, and it was discounted by a bank for J. It was held that S. was not liable to the bank or to J. without extrinsic evidence that he had assumed the liability, and that any agreement to assume such a liability would be an agreement within a statute corresponding to our Statute of Frauds (4th section) as an agreement to answer for the debt or default of another, and must, therefore, be in writing. It was further held that the indorsement was not a sufficient writing. The declaration charged the defendant (S.) in one count upon an agreement to be answerable for the note, and in a second count, as a second indorser, the payee (J.) being treated as first indorser. The judgment of the court treats principally with the claim alleged in the first count, and probably the judge considered that even if the placing of S.'s name on the instrument might have amounted to an authority to J. to sign his name above it, and thus to make S. liable as second indorser to the bank, yet that it was essential, in order to charge S. in this way, that the name of J. should actually be so written, which was not done. In fact, the instrument was considered to show that S. only agreed to assume a liability to subsequent holders, upon condition of having J. liable to him, which did not appear by the instrument to be the case.

Though irregular indorsements certainly are not uncommon, there do not appear to be so many cases upon them in England or in America, and we are not aware that the precise point of the American case to which we have been referring has ever arisen. We propose to notice the leading English decisions, and to point out how far the American case goes beyond them or differs from them.

In the first place it is necessary to notice a distinction between bills of exchange and promissory notes. It was held in Penny v. Innes, (1 Cr. M. & R. 439), following some older cases, that every indorser of a bill of exchange might be treated as a new drawer, so that a person indorsing a bill intermediately between a special indorsement and the blank indorsement of the persons to whom it was so specially indorsed, was held liable to the latter as the drawer of a new bill of the same tenor and effect as the original bill. It was considered that this was an inherent property of the original bill, and that, although as against such an indorser, it might be treated as a fresh bill, yet that no new stamp was required. The doctrine of Penny v. Innes was followed in the recent case of Mathews v. Blozame (12 W. R. 795). There the defendant, intending to become surety to the plaintiffs for A., put his name on the back of a blank bill stamp, on which A. wrote his name as acceptor, and the plaintiffs then drew upon it a bill of exchange payable to their (the drawers') order. It was held that the defendant was liable as the drawer of a bill payable either to bearer or to plaintiffs' order. In that case the Court declined to decide whether the bill was properly described as payable to order or bearer, because the declaration contained counts applicable to each view, and they thought one was necessarily right. It was there said by the Lord Chief Justice that "the doctrine amounts to this, that a man who puts his name in this way to a bill though not in law an indorser, does what an indorser does, he guarantees the payment of the bill by the acceptor at maturity. In that sense he does what a drawer does, and so, though he cannot be called an indorser, he may be treated as a drawer. In a subsequent case (not reported on this point) in which the parties had happened to make exactly the same mistake in filling up the bill as was made by the parties in Mathews v. Blozame, the ruling in that case was acquiesced in. It will be seen that in these cases the person coming in and indorsing the bill was held liable not only to parties claiming subsequently to and under his indorsement, but to parties who would have been prior parties, and could not have sued him if he had had a title to indorse. The rule of Penny v. Innes does not, however, hold in the case of a promissory note. In Gwinnell v. Herbert (5 A. & E. 436), the defendant indorsed a promissory note made by another person to the plaintiff's order. He was sued as maker, but it was held that the action was not maintainable. Mr. Justice Littledale was inclined to doubt whether the doctrine of Penny v. Innes did not require some qualification, even as applied to bills, but all the judges were clearly of opinion that it did not apply to promissory notes. The maker of a note is liable in the first instance, which the drawer of a bill is not, but only upon the default of the acceptor. If each indorser became a maker, he also would become liable in the first instance, which could scarcely be. It will be seen that Gwinnell v. Herbert is a case similar to what the American case would have been if S. had been sued by J. instead of by the bank. It was, however, said in Gwinnell v. Herbert, by Mr. Justice Patterson, that the defendant should have been declared against on his collateral undertaking; implying, of course, that a liability of this sort might have been successfully established. So in Jackson v. Hudson (2 Camp. 447), where a person meaning to be surety for the acceptor of a complete bill had also accepted it, it was held by Lord Ellenborough that he could not be sued as acceptor, but that he might have been sued upon a collateral agreement. In each of these cases, of course, the statement of the judges that the collateral agreement of guaranty might have been sued upon, amounts to no more than an obiter dictum. Still the impression certainly has always been in England that the Statute of Frauds in no way interferes with such a cause of action. Thus, in Fielden v. Marshall (80 L. J. C. B. 159) we find Williams, J., saying that the doctrine of Wain v. Warlters (2 Sm. Lead. Cas.) has never been extended to bills of exchange. We have not however, any express decisions of cases in which this point has been directly raised; but we have numerous decisions on the question whether the contract of the various parties to a bill or note is a contract in writing, in the cases as to whether evidence of a contemporaneous parol agreement varying such a contract is admissible. The foundation, of course, of all these cases is the presumption that where parties put the terms of a contract into writing, they put the whole of it into writing; so that if the contract of a party to a bill or note is a contract in writing, it would be presumed that what appeared of the bill or note was the entire contract, and no evidence of a contemporaneous parol agreement varying this contract would be admissible. The tendency of the Courts to hold that the contract is in all cases for this purpose a contract in writing, has been strong. Of course, however the point is clearer in the case of the acceptor of a bill or maker of a note than in the case of subsequent parties. In Abrey v. Cruz (18 W. R. 63), the most recent case on the subject, the question arose between the payee of a bill and the drawer, and there the Court were all of opinion that the contract was a contract in writing; the only member of the Court who hesitated (Mr. Justice Willes), doubting, apparently, whether the parol contract set up, did really vary the written one. There are also cases, Free v. Harkins (8 Taunt. 92) and Hoare v. Graham (3 Camp. 57), which lay down the same rule as to the contract of the indorser of a note. In one case, however, in the Privy Council (Cas-trique v. Buttigieg, 4 W. R. 445, 10 Moore P. C. 108), it is broadly asserted by Mr. Justice Maule, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee, that the contract of an indorser is not entirely a contract in writing. He says, "The liability of an indorser to his immediate indorsee arises out of a contract between them, and this contract in no case consists exclusively in the writing popularly called an indorsement, and which, indeed is necessary to the existence of the contract in question; but that contract arises out of the written indorsement itself, the delivery of the bill to the indorsee, and the intention with which that delivery was made and accepted, as evinced by the words either spoken or written of the parties, and the circumstances (such as the usage at the place, the course of dealing between the parties, and their relative situations) under which the delivery takes place. Thus, a bill with an unqualified written indorsement may be delivered and received for the purpose of enabling the indorsee to receive the money for account of the indorser, or to enable the indorsee to raise money for his own use on the credit of the signature of the indorser, or with an express stipulation that the indorsee, though for value, is to claim against the drawer and acceptor only, and not against the indorser, who agrees to sell his claim against the prior parties, but stipulates not to warrant their solvency. In all these cases the indorser is not liable to the indorsee, and they are all in conformity with the general law of contracts, which enables parties to them to limit and modify their liabilities as they think fit, provided they do not infringe any prohibitory law."

Of course, this is very high authority. At the same time, the case of Abrey v. Cruz must be taken to throw some doubt upon the first part of the passage we have quoted, or, at all events, to show that it is only true in a less wide sense than might otherwise be attributed to it. We venture to think that the true rule is that the spoken words of the parties are inadmissible to vary the contract of the indorser, but they may be admissible to show there was no contract at all. This is the case with all contracts in writing, the case of an escrow being the most familiar instance; and, in fact, to make complete a written contract, some parol evidence is constantly required, such as the identity of the parties, their signatures, or assent, as contracting parties, to the terms of the written instrument, and even a custom with reference to which the parties had contracted. Even the latter circumstance would not prevent the contract being properly called a written contract. In this sense, therefore, no written contract consists exclusively of the written document. The circumstances which Mr. Justice Maule mentions in the passage we have quoted as requisite to make up the contract of an indorser, as well as the written indorsement, are really only analogous to the requisites we have mentioned as necessary to make any written instrument complete as a binding contract between the parties. We apprehend that all that is required to make what would be in contemplation of the law a written contract is that there should be some tangible and visible record of the terms of the bargain, as distinguished from mere recollection of spoken words. It is not necessary that the contract should be written at length in characters of the ordinary description—a writing in short hand, in Egyptian hieroglyphics, or in any cypher capable of being interpreted, would be a written contract; but, of course, only binding upon the parties as a contract if they understood the cypher. All that is required is a visible sign expressing a particular idea. If, therefore, the mere writing a name in a particular place on a paper containing other names and words is commonly understood to express the fact that the person who signs his name enters into a particular contract, then that contract, when made, is a contract in writing just as much as if its terms were set out at length. We apprehend, therefore, that supposing the ordinary contract of an indorser to be a contract requiring an agreement in writing under the Statute of Frauds, the indorsement in the ordinary form ought to be held to be such an agreement. In fact, however, we apprehend that, although the position of an ordinary indorser of a bill is that of a surety for the acceptor, who is principal debtor, yet that the indorser is not a person promising to answer for the debt or default of the acceptor within the meaning of the Statute of Frauds. He is rather a person promising his indorsee to pay money on his own account, at a certain time, and under certain circumstances, if the indorsee does not, on taking proper steps to do so, get that money from some one else, which, by the transfer of the bill, he has the means of doing. It is perhaps as much on this ground, as the ground of the indorsement being an agreement in writing, that the Statute of Frauds has never been considered to interfere with the contract of an ordinary indorser. This, however, does not directly apply to the case of an irregular indorser; that is, a man who writes his name on a bill or note without appearing by the instrument to have any title to it. As regards such a person we think he would be commonly understood to make himself liable for the bill or note, to all subsequent holders at all events, if not to the then holder, and, if so, it ought to be considered that the indorsement is a sufficient contract in writing to charge him with such a liability.

The result, however, is that, if a person so indorses a bill of exchange, he is, in England, clearly held liable as drawer, and in America the rule in this respect seems to be the same. If, however, he so indorses a note, then neither in England nor in America can he be liable to parties not taking under his indorsement, except upon a collateral undertaking. In England it has been suggested by Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Patterson, but not decided, that an action could be maintained on such collateral undertaking in cases where there was no further writing than the indorsement. In America, however, in the case to which we have referred, and, we believe, in at least one previous case it has been held that a further writing is necessary. As regards subsequent indorsees, the American case lays down the same rule; in England, though the point does not seem to be decided, we cannot help thinking that it would be held that a holder for value had a right of action against any one whose name was on the bill as indorser when he received it, and that the mere fact that the name was not on in quite the proper place would not stand in the way. It may be that the person so indorsing meant only to be liable to subsequent holders upon himself having the liability of the then holder; but, if so, he ought to have seen that it was then indorsed in the proper way, and we doubt if he could set up the fact that this had not been done as against a subsequent holder, as it is held he can do in America, or rather, we should say, in Pennsylvania, for we believe the rule is not the same in all the States. (See 2 Parsons on Bills, 112.)

We have, of course, been speaking of negotiable notes. If the note is not negotiable in the first instance, different questions are necessarily involved.

RATING AND POOR LAW CASES OF 1869.

No. II.

The two rating cases which turn on the construction of the Union Assessment Committee Acts are Reg. v. The Overseers of Malden (17 W. R. C. L. Dig. 96, L. R. 4 Q. B. 326) and Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company (17 W. R. 670, L. R. 4 Q. B. 323).

In the former case the question was whether houses recently built and ready for occupation, but not actually let or occupied, should be inserted in the valuation list. By the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103), all "rateable hereditaments" are to be inserted in this list, and it was said that this must mean that at the time of making the list the houses were occupied so as to be actually assessable; but the Court held, on the authority of Reg. v. Hammersmith, 7 W. R. 524, that this was not so, and that "rateable" meant property in its nature capable of being rated. In the neighbourhood of London and other large towns, where new houses spring up like mushrooms, and the supply exceeds the demand, this interpretation of the Act may largely increase the rateable value of certain parishes, and consequently the amount of their contribution to the common fund; while at the same time, when the rate comes to be actually assessed, the very houses which caused the increase of the rate will be exempt from it, being still unoccupied, and thus an additional burden will be thrown on the existing ratepayers. The words of the Act are, however, too strong to admit of any other interpretation than was put on them, and if the hardship is to be redressed it must be by the Legislature.

The Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, provides, by section 1, that no appeal against a poor rate made for any parish in a union to which the previous Assessment Committee Act applies shall be heard by the Sessions, till the appellant has given the committee twenty-one days' notice, and that no one shall appeal against a rate made in conformity with the valuation list unless he has given notice of his objections to the committee and failed to obtain relief. This section has given rise to much discussion at quarter sessions; but it is clear that the notice of objection and the failure to obtain relief are strictly conditions precedent to the right to appeal at all; and so it was held the other day in Laves v. The Churchwardens of Arlsey (18 W. R. 293). In Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company the railway company had given such notice and failed to obtain relief, and the sessions on appeal confirmed the rate subject to a case. Subsequently however, and before the case had been determined, a fresh rate was made in conformity with the valuation list which the railway company had objected to, and which had not been altered as regarded them. They gave the committee notice of their intention to appeal against this second rate, and then moved to enter and respite the appeal at sessions; but, as they thought the assessment committee would abide by the list which they had before refused to alter when impugned on the same ground, they had not gone before them with fresh notice of objection, and could not strictly be said to have failed to obtain relief. The Court held that they ought to have gone before the assessment committee a second time, and that therefore the sessions were right in refusing to enter and respite the appeal. It too often happens that rating appeals fail on technical objections, and they certainly afford scope for a good deal of ingenuity on that score; but it is always to be regretted where the letter of the law prevents an inquiry into the merits, and where this happens often the procedure must require simplifying. In the present case the appeal failed because the railway company had not done that which the Act in strictness required them to do, but which, if they had done it, would probably have been perfectly useless.

In the legislation of the past year as affecting the subject of rating, the only enactments that call for a brief notice are chapters 41, 67, and 40.

The main object of c. 41 is to amend the law as to rating occupiers for short terms; in other words to amend the position of the irrepressible compound householder. It repeals the Small Tenements Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 99, as regards poor rates, and provides that occupiers of tenements let for three months or less may deduct from their rents the poor rates paid by them, but that the owners may in certain cases, regulated by a scale according to the rateable value in different places, agree to pay the rate instead of the occupiers, and be allowed a commission for so doing; and that the vestry may order the owner to be rated instead of the occupier for houses of rather greater value than under the old Act, but at a rather smaller deduction. It may be remembered that last year some difficulty occurred as to when a rate was made within the meaning of the Parliamentary Registration Acts: Jones v. Bubb, 17 W. R. 205; Ainsworth v. Creak, 17 W. R. 229. The 17th section of the present Act provides that it shall be deemed to be made on the day of allowance.

Chapter 67 we will dismiss with the simple statement that it is a long Act, intended to secure uniformity of assessment in London.

Chapter 40, which we take last, as a bit of piecemeal legislation, exempts Sunday and ragged schools, wherever situate, from all rates. By Reg. v. St. Luke's Hospital, 2 Burr. 1053, and a long series of cases following it, these schools would not have been rateable; but Jones v. The Mersey Docks, 13 W. R. 1069, restored the true construction of the Act of Elizabeth, and showed that the mere fact of their occupying in a fiduciary character for charitable purposes could not exempt the occupiers of valuable property. To avoid the effects of this decision in the particular case, this short Act, we presume, was passed. Sunday or infant schools held in churches, chapels or vestries, were exempted from poor rates by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 30, and this enactment remains untouched.

We now pass to the consideration of the two removal cases.

In former days great hardship was inflicted on the poor man by removing him from the parish where he had worked all his life, and from the neighbourhood of his friends and connections, to a parish in some distant part, which perhaps he had never seen, and scarce even heard of, but which yet was the parish of his legal settlement. To remedy this it was enacted by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1, that no one should be removed from any parish in which he should have resided five years; and by subsequent legislation the requisite period of residence has been reduced to three years, and now to one year, and the requisite limits of residence have been extended from the parish to the whole union (24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 1; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8). By section 12 of the last Act its words are to be construed as if in the Poor Law Act of Will. 4, and by the 109th section of that Act, 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, "union" includes parishes incorporated for the relief of the poor under any local Act. In the Machynlleth Union v. Overseers of Poole, 17 W. R. 1016, L. R. 4 Q. B. 592, the question was whether a district, comprising several parishes and townships incorporated by a private Act of Geo. 4 for the relief of the poor, was a union within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, so that residence in it could confer a status of irremovability; and the Court held that it was. As these incorporations under private Acts are still numerous, the question was one of some importance. It was said that the district was not a union within the Act, because each parish or township in it supported its own paupers, and the common fund was only applicable to the general expenses of the house of industry. Certainly the doctrine of irremovability seems to apply more fairly to those ordinary unions where the poor are relieved out of the common fund, and each parish contributes according to its rateable property, and not according to the number of its chargeable poor; or, to put it another way, it would probably be better if all unions were ordinary unions. Little good can, and much confusion may, come from the incorporation of districts for poor law purposes under private Acts, and it is to be hoped that before long there will be no exceptions from the general poor law system.

By 35 Geo. 3, c. 101, s. 2, an order of removal may be suspended in case of the pauper's illness, and by 49 Geo. 3, c. 124, s. 3, such order may be suspended with reference to every other person named therein—the result of the two acts being that, if a pauper is too ill to be removed, he is not to be separated from his family. In Reg. v. Sculcoates (17 W. R. 100), it was decided that an order of removal once suspended remains so, not only till the pauper is well enough to be moved, but till every member of his family is so. Consequently, if an order of removal is suspended on account of the pauper's illness, and he afterwards dies or recovers, and in the meantime his wife falls ill, so that she also is unfit to travel, the suspension still remains in force with regard to her, though he may have previously died or got well again. By the first-mentioned Act the costs caused by the suspension are to be borne by the parish of settlement—i.e., by the parish to which the pauper would have been removed if well enough. But suppose, in the case put above, the wife, after her husband's death, remains too ill to travel, and so resides in the relieving parish long enough to become irremovable under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, s. 8: who then is to pay the costs incurred by the suspension? It is clear that the Legislature never contemplated such a state of things when they passed the Act of Geo. 3, because there was then no such thing as a status of irremovability; but it is also clear that they intended that the relieving parish should be re-imbursed by the parish of settlement; and so the Court held that the parish of settlement could be ordered to re-imburse the relieving parish for the maintenance of the woman from the suspension till the status of irremovability was acquired; otherwise, irremovability supervening on the pauper's illness would have had the strange and unjust effect of making the original order of removal, which had been rightly made, an absolute nullity. The Act of Geo. 3 provided that these costs of maintenance incurred during suspension should be repaid on the death or removal of the pauper, and did not contemplate the pauper living irremovable in the relieving parish, and dying after some lapse of time. But by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, repayment must be directed within six months of the matter of complaint arising—within six months, it may be said, of the irremovability attaching. But the Act of Geo. 3 says repayment may be ordered on removal, or, "in case of the death of such poor person, before the execution of the order of removal;" and to avoid hardship, the Court construed "death" to mean death at any time, whether after irremovability attached or before. The whole case affords a good illustration of the flexibility of a statute when it has to be applied to a state of things its authors never dreamt of, and of the tendency of modern judges to adopt any decently reasonable construction rather than allow an Act of Parliament to work injustice.

Six Wisconsin jurors recently voted by ballot. Juror No. 1 voted, "No case of action;" No. 2 voted, "Salt and battery Second De Gree;" No. 3 deemed the prisoner "Guilty of Salt;" No. 4 decided there was "no action of caus;" No. 5 voted it "assault and battery;" while No. 6 decided the prisoner "Guilty of an a salt only."

STATUTE OF FRAUDS (29 CAR. 2, c. 3), s. 4—AGREEMENT RELATING TO THE SALE OF AN INTEREST IN LAND.

Horsey v. Graham, C. P., 18 W. R. 141.

The famous Statute of Frauds affords an inexhaustible supply of new points for the exercise of legal ingenuity. Although the statute is nearly two hundred years old, there is never a year in which some new question is not decided on the construction of its 4th or 17th sections. Horsey v. Graham is an instance of this. The defendant agreed to transfer to the plaintiff the residue of a term of years then in the possession of other persons. The action was for not transferring the term. The question was (amongst others), whether this agreement came within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, as being "a contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them." Prima facie it would seem that there could be no doubt that such an agreement was a contract for an interest in land, but it was argued that it need not be in writing because the defendant was not the owner of the term of years and had no interest in it, and that his contract was rather like one for work and labour than for the sale of an interest in land. There was no direct authority on the point, but the Court held that the agreement was within the statute. Keating, J., although he did not formally dissent from the rest of the Court, expressed a doubt whether this section was meant "to apply to the case where one of the contracting parties has not, and does not intend himself to part with, some interest." Brett, J., in his judgment seems to answer this very satisfactorily: "if we put the converse case of the defendant suing the plaintiff on this contract, what would he be suing him for . . . not for work and labour, but for damages for not taking an assignment he had contracted to take. It could not be said then that that was not a contract concerning land, and was not within the Statute of Frauds."

Notwithstanding the doubt expressed by Keating, J., it is probable that this decision will be acquiesced in as being founded on the true construction of the statute. It seems reasonable that the nature of the contract should be gathered from its subject-matter and its scope, and not from the circumstances of the parties to the contract. An agreement by A. to sell land to B. must be a "contract or sale of land," &c., whether A. is or is not then the owner of the land agreed to be sold.

REVIEWS.

The Law Magazine and Law Review. February, 1870. No. LVI. New Series. London: Butterworths.

This number of the Law Magazine contains nothing of any peculiar interest, but there are several articles that are worth reading. Those most likely to attract attention on account of their titles are on "Trades Union Legislation," "The Land Question," and "The New Bankruptcy Act." The first of these discusses the present state of the law with respect to trades unions, and argues that the chief alterations required are that the funds of unions should be protected, that there should be perfect liberty for masters and men to combine together to do any act which would not be criminal if attempted to be done by an individual, and that every trades union should be registered. We gather from the tone of the article, although it is not so stated, that the author does not propose to give effect, in civil proceedings, to rules and agreements in restraint of trade. He only argues that such combinations should not be criminal. This, however, is now clearly law since the decision of Reg. v. Stainer in the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, which we noticed last week, and therefore no legislative interference is now necessary on this point. The article on the "Land Question" is composed almost exclusively of extracts from newspapers on the subject of the Irish land question, and contains hardly any original matter. The article on the "New Bankruptcy Act" is a resumé of the law of bankruptcy under the new Act, and points out some of the changes that it has made. The remaining articles, on Life Assurance, the County Courts, Exemption of Private Property on the Ocean, the Charters of the City of London, Slander, the Law of Limitation, the Works of George Coode, the French Bar and Sanitary Law, are of the ordinary type, and do not contain anything calling for special notice.

There are the usual notices of new books and of the events of the quarter.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Feb. 15.—Re E. F. Packer.

Petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition—Bankruptcy Act, 1869, sections 125 and 126—Injunction to restrain proceedings—260th rule.

The debtor, on the 5th inst. filed in the London Court of Bankruptcy, a petition for liquidation by arrangement; and on the 7th, a levy was made on his effects by F. G. Packer, his brother, for £12 10s., arrears of annuity payable under the will of their father, and for a further sum of £17 10s., alleged to be due to him as residuary legatee.

It appeared that by the will of the father, the debtor was appointed sole executor, and he was empowered to collect the rents of certain houses, to pay certain annuities to his brothers, of whom F. G. Packer was one, and to divide the residue, after payment of repairs and ground rent equally between himself and F. G. Packer. By a codicil it was declared that the debtor and his brother were to hold the property as joint tenants. At the time of the petition being filed F. G. Packer was a creditor of the debtor for the sum of £12 10s., being one half year's annuity to which he was entitled under the terms of the will, and for which also he had power to distrain, and he also claimed £17 10s., which he alleged was due to him as his share of certain moneys received by the debtor for rents. The debtor repudiated the latter claim, and said that a larger sum than £17 10s. was due to him by way of arrears for repairs.

Brough, for the debtor, now applied, under the 260th of the new rules, for an order restraining F. G. Packer from proceeding to a sale of the debtor's effects. He said that the amount of the annuity already due had been tendered to the bailiff, but he had declined to receive it; and he contended that the object of the 260th rule was to protect the debtor's property, and that F. G. Packer had no right, under colour of a legal right to a certain sum by way of annuity, to endeavour to obtain a preference over the other creditors by making a levy for a larger sum than that to which he was entitled.

Reed, for F. G. Packer, contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere, and, if it had, that the facts were not such as to warrant interference.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that F. G. Packer had no right to distrain for anything beyond the £12 10s., and the better way would be to make an order by consent that, upon payment of that sum, together with the costs of the levy, the bailiff should withdraw. His Lordship intimated, at the same time, that it was desirable in a case of this sort, where there were conflicting rights, to appoint a receiver.

Order accordingly.

Re Trevett.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 11, 15, 20, and 72.

In this case an interim injunction had been obtained at the instance of the trustee appointed under the adjudication, restraining Messrs. Harrison, auctioneers, from proceeding to a sale of the bankrupt's furniture and effects. It appeared that Messrs. Harrison held a bill of sale dated in September, 1869, and on the 12th of January the bankrupt signed a declaration of insolvency, which was the foundation of an adjudication obtained against him on the 14th. On the 13th, Messrs. Harrison took possession under their security, and proceeded to advertise a sale. The matter was noticed ante p. 316.

Reed now stated the facts, and asked that a perpetual injunction might be granted, on the ground that the goods were in the apparent possession of the bankrupt at the period of the act of bankruptcy.

Bagley for Messrs. Harrison.

The CHIEF JUDGE suggested that the proper course to adopt would be for the trustee, as representing the court and the creditors, to sell the goods; the proceeds to abide further order.

Counsel on both sides agreed to this mode of dealing with the case.

The CHIEF JUDGE added that there would be an order restraining Messrs. Harrison from remaining in possession of the property.

Feb. 16.—Ex parte Paine, Re Bernadat.

178th and 179th Rules under Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

This was an application on behalf of the trustee under an adjudication obtained against the bankrupt on the 12th of January, for an order for the commitment of Mr. Flight and several other persons for contempt of court.

Bagley and Brough for the trustee.

Sargood, Serjt., and F. Knight for the respondents.

The affidavits showed that in October last the bankrupt executed a mortgage of his premises in Leadenhall-street and of the fixtures therein to Mr. Flight, but the bankrupt remained in possession up to the period of the adjudication. On the 13th January notice of the bankruptcy was given to Mr. Flight, and on the following day his agents entered into possession of the premises. On the 15th the messenger went into possession on behalf of the registrar, pursuant to an order made on the previous day; and the trustee alleged that on the 22nd and 25th January Mr. Flight or his agents had improperly interfered with the messenger; that they had been guilty of other acts of aggression by removing or attempting to remove fixtures; and that considerable damage had been done.

Sargood, Serjt., objected at the outset to the reading in support of the application of affidavits other than those upon which it was made in the first instance.

Bagley contended that all the applicant was bound to do in the first instance was to make out a prima facie case, and, by analogy to the practice in Chancery, that further affidavits could be filed up to the period of the hearing. In this case the additional affidavits had been served on the respondent's solicitor, and they had been answered inferentially.

The CHIEF JUDGE said this was an application to commit certain persons for contempt by reason of the facts contained in certain affidavits, and the grounds could not now be enlarged.

In support of the application several affidavits were read, and reference was made to Ex parte Page, 17 Ves. 59, also reported in Rose 1, deciding that a contumacious obstruction of the messenger was a contempt of court. It appeared that on two occasions some sixteen or seventeen men had entered the premises and had caused a great disturbance.

For the respondents it was contended that no disrespect to the authority of the Court was ever intended, and that the sole object of Mr. Flight had been to protect the fixtures from being distrained by the landlord, who did, on the 15th, come into possession; and that there was nothing upon the face of the affidavits to show that the men were placed in possession for the purpose of terrifying the messenger. It was a conflict between the mortgagee and the landlord and nothing more. Dalton v. Whitem, 12 L. J. N. S. Q. B. 65, was cited.

The CHIEF JUDGE, in giving judgment, said that up to the date of the bankruptcy nothing had been done by Mr. Flight with a view to possession being taken of the property, and his interest was in suspense for the time. There appeared to have been such an interference with the possession by the messenger that the Court was bound to vindicate its authority, otherwise claims might be put forward in other cases which would tend to obstruct the officers of the Court and defeat the law in bankruptcy. A dispute appeared to have arisen between the landlord and the mortgagee with regard to their right to the fixtures, and his Lordship was of opinion that the trustee was greatly to blame in not having set forth fully and fairly every part of his case; for, if the Court had known, upon the application being made, all that had taken place between Mr. Morley, the solicitor for the landlord, and Mr. Flight, what the real facts were, and that there was no intention on the part of Mr. Flight to dispute the authority of the Court, but only to dispute the right of the landlord, a different order might have been made. What Mr. Flight had done was perfectly unjustifiable; he had no right to invade the possession of the messenger; and although the Court was not willing to go to the extent of the notice of motion now that the property was safe and free from invasion, an order would be made that the respondents pay the costs, except so far as those costs had been increased by the affidavits in reply, the statements in which, if made at all, should have been made in the first instance.

Order accordingly.

Feb. 16th.—Ex parte the Agra Bank (Limited), Re Barber.

Letter of guarantee—Right of proof.

This was an application by the Agra Bank (Limited), to prove a debt of £16,825, against the estate of James Barber & Co., which was being wound up under a registered deed dated October, 1867. The claim was made upon the terms of a letter of guarantee which the debtors had given to the bank in consideration of their granting a letter of credit to the Cachar Tea Company, to draw upon their bank at Calcutta to the extent of £20,000, as against tea to be forwarded to the debtors, from the proceeds of which tea the latter were to recoup themselves their liability. Between January and June, 1866, bills at six months, to the extent of £16,000, had been drawn. The bank stopped payment in June, 1866, and all these bills (excepting the last, which had been purchased by the bank) were dishonoured at maturity, but had since been paid in full by the bank. No tea had ever been forwarded by the Tea Company to the debtors, and the claim was now resisted by the trustees, upon several grounds, but mainly upon the fact that the circumstance of the bank having stopped payment was the cause of the tea not having been forwarded as intended, and that this had operated to their prejudice as sureties.

Finlay Knight for the bank; Sargood, Serjt., for the trustees.

The CHIEF JUDGE, after reviewing the evidence, said that, upon the authority of Re Agra Bank, Ex parte Tondeur, 16 W.R. 270, the bank was in no default in not providing for the bills at maturity, and that the fact of the stoppage of the bank did not excuse the debtors or their principals from forwarding the goods, and that the other objections were invalid. As, however, the evidence did not sufficiently disclose when the bills had been paid, there must be a reference to the registrar to ascertain the precise amount which the bank was entitled to prove upon the above footing.

INSURANCE COMPANIES AND THEIR AMALGAMATIONS.

We regret that we have not space this week for the long letter of "Another Policyholder in an Amalgamated Company."

THE NEW ALBERT LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

We have not space to insert Mr. Charles Henry Edmonds' criticism of the rival reconstruction scheme which we noticed last week. We are glad to learn from Mr. Edmonds' letter that the "New Albert Scheme" proposes that policyholders should be entitled both to attend and vote at meetings.

THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—The Judicature Commissioners next ask:—"18. Is it expedient to make any, and what, change in the fees allowed on taxation to either counsel or solicitors? 19. Ought the court fees payable by the suitors in the county courts to be reduced in common law, equity, or admiralty jurisdiction?"

These two questions relate to very important matters, and it is especially difficult to answer them properly in the form of a letter. I may, however, draw attention to a few salient points, a proper understanding of which may be productive of some good. And first as to the court fees payable in common law proceedings. These, as a general rule, are based on the sound principle of being few in number, easily understood by the suitors, and easily kept in account by the clerks. The three principal fees are—one shilling in the pound up to £20 for every plaint; a like sum for every judgment by default, or by consent, or on admission; and two shillings in the pound for every hearing where the demand is not admitted. Now, although I cannot deny that to charge a premium of fifteen per cent. on the administration of justice is a very burdensome tax, and I am clearly of opinion, with the County Court Commissioners of 1855, that the five per cent., at present payable on plaints, might safely be reduced to two and a-half per cent., still I am aware that to keep up the county court system a large sum, in addition to the annual Parliamentary grant, must be derived from the suitors themselves. The question, therefore, which I wish to discuss is not so much a question of amount as one of practical detail, and I think I shall be able to explain very clearly that an alteration, which was first made in 1862, with respect to the fee payable on admission has been extremely mischievous. Prior to that year the reduction of the hearing fee by one-half was only allowed in cases where, before the plaintiff actually appeared in court, the defendant had acknowledged the debt, and had come to terms as to the mode of payment. The object of charging a less fee in this case than on a hearing was to induce defendants who had no real answer to the claims against them, to save the time of their opponents and of the Court by consenting to judgment being entered up. It enabled a creditor to say to a debtor, with a good chance of the latter listening to what was said, "You know you owe me the money I demand, save me the annoyance of going into court, and you will yourself escape one-half of the hearing fee."

The County Court Commissioners, with whom this plan originated, thought that it would relieve the judges from much troublesome routine business, which might be safely permitted to "do itself;" and no doubt it has had that effect to a very great extent. But, unfortunately, in 1862, the Lords of the Treasury, unmindful of the reasons which had led the County Court Commissioners to frame the rule, and desirous of, as they fancied, improving upon it, made an order that in all cases where the defendant or his agent should, at the hearing, admit the claim, the hearing fee should be reduced from ten to five per cent. It will readily be understood that the effect of this new order was in a great degree to neutralise the good which the County Court Commissioners had done. The defendants having no longer any special motive for making an early admission, are apt to put off that disagreeable process to the last available moment, trusting to what is called "the chapter of accidents," which may prevent the plaintiff from appearing at the trial. The time of the Court is then once more taken up in settling disputes, which the parties could equally well have settled between themselves; but this is the least of the evils caused by the new order.

As all fees in the county courts are prepaid, the effect of an admission at the trial is to entitle the plaintiff to a return of half the hearing fee, and this brings in its train two serious inconveniences. One is, that the fee book, of necessity, is kept in a chronic state of erasure and interpolation, the admission fee being substituted, in a multitude of cases, for the hearing fee, and the accounts embroiled in consequence. The other is, that as few of the plaintiffs are "well up" in all the technical rules of the court, it constantly happens that they are not aware of their right to any return of fees; and they consequently make no demand on the subject. This affords an opportunity to the clerk for speculation on a large scale, and holds out a temptation to malpractices to which no man ought to be exposed.

In the schedule of fees which was sanctioned in 1867, and which is still in force, the mischievous order of 1862, which I have just discussed, was again inserted, and that schedule also contains two other fees of trifling amount indeed, but both of which are faulty in principle and pernicious in practice. The first is an additional fee of one shilling, when the claim exceeds £2, and the summons is to be served by the bailiff; the second is a like fee of one shilling "for each defendant above three." What renders this last fee the more remarkable is, that the Lords of the Treasury have been unwisely recommended to impose it, in direct opposition to the advice of the County Court Commissioners, who expressed a unanimous opinion that "no increase of fees should be made by reason of there being more than one plaintiff or defendant." The mischief caused by these fees is, that they confuse the accounts, and by affording convenient excuses for mistakes, they facilitate frauds.

Turning now to the fees and costs payable in equitable proceedings, I have no hesitation in expressing an opinion, that the schedules sanctioned by the authorities are altogether faulty. Just imagine two scales of court fees, one where the subject of the suit exceeds, and one where it does not exceed, £100, in both of which the registrar is empowered to receive between thirty and forty separate fees, while the high bailiff may make the suitor "stand and deliver" on eight or ten different occasions. I will not attempt to enumerate the costs which may be demanded by the legal adviser; suffice it to say that their name, like that of the devils of old, should be "Legion," for they are very many, and it would require more leisure than most men possess to become acquainted with their details. All that I can do is to illustrate the practical working of the system, by referring briefly to the costs incurred in two or three simple suits which have been disposed of in my own court.

The first I shall mention was an administration suit, in which the plaintiff sought to recover a legacy of £80, and the executor had a counter-claim for certain disbursements.

The Court ordered that the plaintiff should receive £53 6s. and costs, and these last were taxed on the lower scale at £18 17s. 8d. The next was also an administration suit, in which the question to be determined was, which of two charitable institutions was entitled to a legacy of £180. Part of the description was applicable to one of the charities and part to the other. "The voice was Jacob's voice, but the hands were the hands of Esau." I heard one or two witnesses for the purpose of obtaining full information respecting the two charities, and decided in favour of the claimants. The costs as taxed on the higher scale were as follow:—Costs of the claimants £18 6s. 4d., costs of the other charity £6 2s., costs of the trustees £9 15s. 6d., making a total of £34 3s. 10d. The only remaining case I shall mention was a suit for dissolution of partnership. After a receiver had been appointed, an interlocutory application was made, on behalf of the landlord of the partnership premises, for £20, being a year's rent, to be paid out of funds in the receiver's hands. There was no opposition to this demand, and it was granted at once, with costs. When the costs were sent in for taxation, the registrar was startled to find a claim for £15, the landlord's solicitor contending that, as the partnership property exceeded £100 in value, he was entitled to have the costs taxed on the higher scale. The registrar could not "see this," nor could I; and ultimately the costs were taxed on the lower scale at £6 1s. I leave the commissioners to decide for themselves whether the law does not require large amendment, which enables an attorney to recover such costs for such services.

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

Sir,—The observations sent herewith were written at the suggestion of one of the Liverpool county court judges, and were much approved by him. If you consider them fit for your journal they are at your service.

I know that the complaints I make are those also of a great body of the profession, and I believe that when legislation on a subject is imminent, ventilating the imperfections of the present system best leads the way to its amendment.

JOHN JOSH. YATES.

11, South John-street, Liverpool,
7th February.

Sir,—An entire remodelling of the system of county court practice is suggested by most of the provincial law societies, and their suggestions will come before the Judicature Commission.

But assuming it to be wiser that the practice should be left substantially in its present state, there are certain faults which the interests of the public require to be dealt with at once. The existence of these faults for a long time caused avoidance of the county court by suitors in money cases; but now that suitors are forced to that court under penalty of losing their costs, the difficulties which kept them away should in fairness be removed.

The first objection, and that most substantially felt, is the absence of an efficient procedure to obtain judgment by default. As matter of practice it is well known to solicitors that of the number of actions in the superior courts and courts of passage which they commence in the course of a year, nine-tenths do not go beyond plea, judgment by default being obtained either for want of appearance or of plea; the great majority of such judgments, however, are for want of appearance. In most cases service of the writ is effected within three days after the writ is issued, and the plaintiff is entitled to issue execution in nineteen days, but very frequently defendant pays several days before the time for execution. The result is that a plaintiff recovers his account without being put to any trouble but that of giving the first instructions to his attorney.

It is answered that in certain cases the county courts permit judgment by default. Why in certain cases at all? why not in all cases, or at least in all cases above

£5, if there should be a limit, which is very doubtful? To permit judgment by default in all cases above £5 would unquestionably be a very great advantage to plaintiffs, and to bond fide defendants it would only give a little extra trouble, and the disadvantage which would ensue to those who had no defence would hardly be ground for objection. But to deal in order of their age with those cases in which judgment by default may now be obtained in the county court:—

1. In actions on bills of exchange the chief objection to the formula of obtaining judgment is that the summons must be personally served by officers of the court.

2. In actions above £20. The objections to this formula are that too long a time is occupied, that the summons requires personal service by a bailiff of the court. (1.) From the day of issuing a summons to the return day there is generally an interval of about five weeks, and until that return day the plaintiff cannot obtain his judgment. Why should he be so long delayed? If the practice of the county court in this respect be right, then that of the superior courts must work injustice, and vice versa. (2.) In the populous districts of some county courts a very large number of summonses are issued every day, and there are not a very large number of bailiffs to serve them. The time of those bailiffs being fully occupied with summonses which do not require personal service, it is impossible for them to give to personal service that time and attention which is required to securely effect it. Some men can only be found at certain times in the day, some only by constant watching, and others must be followed about. The plaintiffs only know these peculiarities of their debtors, they can effect or direct service, but how can the county court bailiff be expected to succeed in such cases; they do not succeed, and in consequence the suitor who adopts this provision for obtaining judgment loses his time and trouble, and instead of recovering his debt, has to begin his proceedings over and over again. Can any sensible reason be assigned why the plaintiffs should not get served as they like the documents upon which they depend for success?

3. Section 2, County Courts Act, 1867. This was a step in the right direction but was a lame step and did not go far enough. First, the time occupied in obtaining judgment is much too long. Secondly, why is it limited to actions for goods to be dealt with in the way of defendant's calling? It will be found in experience that debts for goods so supplied are generally punctually paid, and actions for their recovery are seldom met with in a county court. The staple classes of county court claims are those for goods supplied for personal use or consumption, for work, or money. Thus, this section is of little use, and has been little used; it is a great cry with very little wool.

The next objection is that the plaintiff is not entitled to sue in the county court of the district in which he resides unless the defendant resides or the cause of action arose in it. Why should a man be obliged to follow his debtor about? A great quantity of the sales of goods which are effected throughout the country are made by travellers for large houses in large towns. That the necessary witnesses should go down to the country place to prove a small debt is out of the question—the expense and inconvenience would exceed the amount involved. Therefore, the creditor, rather than bring an action in the debtor's county court, abandons the debt, and it has been known that debtors, well able to pay, have constantly avoided doing so by placing reliance on the difficulties besetting their creditors in this respect. All injustice to debtors might be avoided by power being given to the Court to remove any cause on good reason being shown.

Thirdly. There should be something more in the nature of pleadings on the plaintiff's side. The statement in the summons taken with the particulars is generally sufficient, but under the present practice there is nothing to tell a plaintiff what case he has to meet unless a few special defences which are not of very general occurrence are used. In ordinary actions on the money counts there will generally be no defence, or no defence except that of payment. That is a defence which must be pleaded in the other courts, and if that is the only defence the plaintiff will not be put to the trouble of proving his claim, or, if the defendant puts him to that trouble, it will be at the former's expense. But where a similar defence is to be raised in the county court action, the plaintiff must nevertheless be prepared to prove his own case entirely; he must have in attendance the clerk or traveller who sold the goods, and the carters who delivered them; and when it turns out that such witnesses were wholly unnecessary, and he is beaten on the question of payment, he has no remedy for the extra expense he has been put to. Again, take the case of an action on a bill of exchange; the plaintiff may be put to prove signature, consideration (if action against drawer), presentment, and notice of dishonour. It may very often happen that each of these defences may require separate witnesses, with all of whom the plaintiff, to be safe, must be provided when one only will turn out to be necessary. Again, take the common case of a collision between two vehicles; the plaintiff must not only be prepared with witnesses of the occurrence, who are often numerous enough, but also with evidence of the ownership of his own and the defendant's vehicles. These cases will show sufficiently that a plaintiff may be put to considerable trouble and expense by coming to trial unaware of his adversary's defence, and the remedy for the grievance would be very simple; concede an extended power of obtaining judgment by default, and you have already imposed on the defendant the necessity for giving notice of that defence; then let him add to his notice a simple statement of the grounds of his defence. The defendant should be confined to those grounds at the hearing, subject to a power reserved to the judge to amend on terms, if necessary, and a successful defendant should pay the costs occasioned by his stating more grounds of defence than he proves.

Some power to obtain further particulars of plaintiff's claim would occasionally be a boon; at present, the only means of obtaining them is to administer interrogatories.

No doubt the alterations which are here suggested would lead to increased expense in many cases, and a new scale of costs in actions, say between £5 and £20, and the employment of attorneys in those actions would become necessary. But is that an evil? Many are the cases in which a county court judge is materially assisted in doing substantial justice between the parties by the dispute being thoroughly sifted by a skilled advocate on each side. Besides, by judgments by default the Court would be freed from the trial of cases in which there was no dispute, and where there is a substantial dispute suitors are entitled to have skilled assistance, and are not to be called upon either to unravel the difficulties of our somewhat complicated laws themselves, or to be obliged, irrespective of the justice or injustice of the case, to pay for the assistance they require. No attorney can, for the miserable fee now allowed under £20, properly get up a disputed case; no doubt many profess to do so, but they generally only give to the case that attention which the fee deserves. The work of an attorney, like that of any other person, will be proportioned in skill and labour to the remuneration received.

With reference to the practice in Admiralty there is very little to complain of, except that there should be a power to consolidate suits, and that in actions for wages an amount, say £10, should be fixed as the lowest limit of a verdict which would carry costs. The inexpensive procedure before justices is sufficient for small claims for wages; it was almost invariably considered satisfactory before 1868, and it is a great grievance to shipowners that in contesting a few shillings of a sailor's claim for wages they should render themselves liable to costs amounting to between £14 and £20.

At the same time, however, while it is admitted that the present practice in Admiralty does not much injuriously affect suitors it is plain that the labours of the judges and the officers of the court must be seriously increased. If a certain jurisdiction in rem be reserved, and the suggestions as to notice of defence made in this paper be acted upon, it is difficult to see why all Admiralty cases, except perhaps actions for collision and salvage, should not follow the procedure of the court in ordinary cases. Collision and salvage cases are excepted, because in them a more extended statement of the facts giving rise to a plaintiff's claim than could be contained in an ordinary summons is imperatively necessary.

With regard to equity practice, it is impossible that could be assimilated to the ordinary practice, because, except in two cases, the decree of the Court could not be worked out by the use of any of the powers by which the Court enforces its orders in common law causes. Those two cases are, (1) the claim of a legatee in an administration suit; (2) the claim of a creditor in a similar suit. Now, although "A Metropolitan County Court Judge" has written in the Solicitors' Journal to a contrary effect, the writer thinks that any one conversant with equity practice will see at once that even in those two cases, in the event of a defendant disputing the claim, justice could not be properly dealt out to a plaintiff in an ordinary trial in the court. A creditor or legatee usually knows very little as to the assets of the intestate or testator, and has little or no means of coming to trial prepared to rebut a defendant's statement that there are no assets or that the assets are fully administered. He would be at the mercy of a defendant unless he had the means of extracting from the defendant himself information as to the estate, and fully investigating his payments and receipts. Where it was stated that the estate was insolvent the claimant in that case, as in every other case of insolvency, should have ample opportunity of testing the alleged insolvency. On the other hand, if the claim be admitted or decreed for on the hearing, and there be no insolvency, no injury need, except from his own fault, accrue to the defendant, because it is or ought to be well known that an administration suit by creditor or legatee can at any time be put an end to by payment of the particular debt or legacy.

But the amount of court fees in equity suits is very objectionable, and negatives the intention of providing cheap justice. No doubt the scale of fees has been framed upon the principle acted on in the formation of the county courts, that they should be self supporting; but is not the principle wrong? Why should suitors who claim small sums pay all the expenses of the courts they make use of while those who claim large sums only pay a part of the expense of the courts in which they sue. In an equity case in the county court contested, and in which the rule is that both parties' costs come out of the estate, an estate of £100 is generally divided between the lawyers and the court fees, the latter taking a very large slice.

Before closing these remarks a few words may be said as to those common law cases which are sent for trial after issue joined. No doubt they occupy a portion of the time of the Court, and to that extent prejudice the legitimate suitors in the county court. It is never with any semblance of reason contended that these cases are not originally fit for the court in which they are actually tried, but their being brought in the superior court is the fault of the inadequacy of the county court procedure before trial. When an attorney is instructed to recover a debt, say of £30, he looks first to obtaining an immediate judgment if the claim be admitted; and, secondly, to knowing what he has to try if a trial is to take place. He finds that he cannot be secure of attaining either of these objects by commencing proceedings in a county court; and therefore goes to a superior court, and ultimately he comes to trial before a county court judge, having failed, but only after an effort, to obtain judgment by default, with a full knowledge of the questions to be tried.

JOHN JOSEPH YATES.

BOULTON'S CASE—REVISION OF THE STAMP LAW.

Sir,—I congratulate the Manchester Law Association upon the prompt energy and spirit they have displayed in coming to the rescue with their memorial to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The memorial states that during the last twenty years nine Acts having stamps for their principal subject have been passed; but the fact is that nineteen Stamp Acts, properly so called, have been passed within that period, as you will see at a glance by the printed and MS. lists enclosed.

The memorialists, too, in asking Mr. Lowe to undertake a consolidation of the stamp laws, ignore the fact that he, at the beginning of last session, in reply to the inquiry of a member, told the House that the Solicitors of Inland Revenue were then engaged upon the work of consolidation, and that if not that (last) session, yet most certainly next (the present) session he hoped to introduce a bill for the purpose; and yet that nothing whatever is intimated in the Queen's speech of this session upon the subject.

The memorial says that many hundred building leases must have been invalidated for purposes of evidence by the decision in Boulton's case. Seeing that the question of the chargeability of the separate 35s. stamp was never before raised until the Inland Revenue authorities just recently raised it, and that no one lease made since the passing of the Act in 1854 bears the stamp, as I believe—rather, therefore, than hundreds, it may be said that thousands of leases are so invalidated for want of it.

Not to refer to other points touched upon by the memorial, I will just observe that one is glad to find it boldly urging consolidation and general revision. This question of consolidation and revision is not, however, new to your columns; nor that of the objectionable legislation upon the stamp duties, and the bad framing of the Acts, which during recent years—and in lieu of consolidation—we have been favoured with. In particular it has been complained that, while so many heads of duty have been reduced, and many deeds and instruments which were charged with the "deed," or a fixed duty approximating to it in amount, have been charged with a lesser duty, yet that this "deed" stamp was allowed to remain at 35s.—and so to operate with great harshness in many cases, relatively with other duties, and to create gross anomaly and inconsistency in the Acts as a body; and we could not have had a further and stronger proof of this than the result of the decision in Boulton's case.

To conclude with a word or two more on this case, I do not hesitate saying that the construction and application given by the Court to section 16 of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 84, will go to extend it, and so charge the 35s. in—I may say many—other cases besides building leases, and where it will operate with equal hardship and inconsistency, and where, equally with building leases, the framers of the Act never intended it should apply. And, indeed, I believe I can say that the Inland Revenue Solicitors, emboldened by the decision in Boulton's case, are asking for payment of the 35s. in other cases than the leases, which were never suggested as being chargeable by their very able predecessors in office.

These last remarks of mine touch upon a subject which is scarcely second in importance—as regards the interest of the profession and the Revenue to that of consolidation and revision of the Acts—I mean the recently changed views, practice, and organisation of the Inland Revenue Office. This subject cannot be adequately dealt with at the end of a hurried letter, and, therefore, I will end with only expressing surprise that the profession, and especially our societies, have not ere this openly and energetically moved in the matter.

COSTS.

Sir,—Does the practice of any of your readers enable them to decide, or even to venture an opinion on, the following case:—I know of no decision in point, nor does my pleader, though in extensive practice. It became needful to bring an action for an account against an agent who had received rents for the plaintiff. What amount he had received was not known, but it was believed some £70. This surmise turned out correct, for on administering interrogatories, the reply was, that he had received nearly that sum, but claimed a set off which would reduce the amount due to some £3. Now, the set off is notoriously "cooked," and there is a great reason to hope that it can be reduced, and even if the plaintiff failed in reducing it, as a balance is admitted, if that balance would carry the costs, it would be prudent for him to continue the action, as he has two motives; one, to get the set off reduced, and the other to get his costs, which as the £3 is not paid into court he cannot get without going to trial or reference. The question is therefore, would the recovery of this admitted balance carry the costs?

It is presumed the point turns upon whether a judge would, or would not, certify for costs under the 5th section of the County Courts Act, 1867. On the "pro" side it will be seen that the plaintiff was compelled to sue in a superior court, as he had good reason to believe the defendant owed above £50, and he had no means of knowing what set off defendant would claim; and, in fact, he has proved by defendant's own admission that more than £50 was due to him, and this proof is only obtained by the action, as all efforts to get an account without proceedings were futile. On the "con" side there are the two facts; one, if he cannot disturb the set off, £3 only will be recovered, the other, that even if he can reduce the set off, he cannot hope to reduce it so much as to bring the sum recovered to above £20.

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES.

The following correspondence has been forwarded to us for publication:—

Boulton v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

Shannon Court, Bristol, 12th Feb., 1870.

Sir,—Referring to your letter of the 31st ult. to Messrs. Oliver & Botterell, solicitors, Sunderland, stating that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have determined not to exact any penalties on the re-stamping of deeds shown to be insufficiently stamped by the decision in this case, where they are taken to be stamped within a reasonable time, we beg to enquire whether a delay until the end of the present Session of Parliament in sending deeds insufficiently stamped to have the needful stamps affixed, pending the issue of the petitions now being sent from solicitors in all parts of the country, praying Parliament to pass without loss of time a measure of indemnity and repeal, will necessitate an exactment of the penalties?—We are, Sir, your obedient servants,

ISAAC COOKE & SONS.

Gentlemen,—In reply to your letter of the 12th inst., I beg to say that a delay in sending instruments of the description to which you refer, pending the determination of the Government with reference to an Indemnity Act, would not, in my opinion, be unreasonable.—I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant, LIABILITY OF SCOTCH RAILWAY COMPANY FOR LUGGAGE BOOKED TO LONDON.

Sir,—A gentleman leaving Scotland to reside in England takes a ticket at the Caledonian Railway Station at Glasgow as a passenger to London. His luggage is duly addressed; it is labelled by a porter to the company, and put into the luggage van. The luggage is lost on the journey, and the passenger, after efforts made to obtain compensation from the Railway Company, is left to his remedy against them at law. The Company have no place of business in England, but their passengers are forwarded from Scotland to London by the London and North Western Railway Company. Can you inform me, by a future number of your journal, if, by the general law of Scotland or by statute, the Company would be liable by contract express or implied, to compensate the passenger for his loss; or in other words, were the Company bound to take care of the luggage? If they were bound by the general law of Scotland or by statute, can or cannot the passenger sue the Company in England, or must he resort to the Scotch courts for his remedy against the Caledonian Railway Company?

It is stated by a writer to the signet residing at Glasgow, that a decision upon the point has recently been pronounced by one of the Scotch courts, that the remedy is in Scotland only. This may or may not be so, but if so the answer to query No. 7 in your journal of the 22nd ult (common law questions) suggests the doubt I entertain upon the question I now put, and that possibly the passenger has a right to sue in England. At any rate the answer might elucidate the principle of the maxim, "debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci."

QUESTIO.

LOVESY'S BANKRUPTCY.

Sir,—I venture to observe that you have omitted to notice a fault in this little work in your review. I do not know how other practitioners may regard it, but I look upon the fault to which I allude as a very grave one; at all events it has caused me much annoyance, and I cannot help thinking that if Mr. Lovesy will not or cannot alter his book, he ought to alter the advertisement of it in your journal by which I was misled, and by which others also will be misled I should think. In the advertisement I am informed that the book contains "The Debtors Act, 1869," but when I get it the most important part of this statute (the sections from 3 to 9) is altogether omitted, so that I say it does not contain "The Debtors Act, 1869." It is very true that Mr. Lovesy states he has left out these provisions because they do not relate to bankruptcy; but one cannot know this fact till one gets the book itself, and it is then too late for the publishers on being referred to say "they are sorry, but the book is quite perfect": so it is as Mr. Lovesy wrote it, but not as Lovesy advertised it.

A SOLICITOR.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 14.—Sunday Trading.—Lord Chelmsford introduced a bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Feb. 11.—The New Law Courts.—In reply to Mr. Headlam, the First Commissioner of Works said that Mr. Street was now engaged by his directions in drawing up plans for the construction of the Courts within the limits of the site prescribed by the Act passed in 1865, also within the limits of the funds which were provided by the Act passed in the same year.

Farm Horse Licences.—In reply to Mr. Milbank, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had no intention of bringing in a bill exempting farm horses from licence when employed in hauling for parish road repairs.

Returning Officers' Expenses.—Serjeant Simon moved, appropos of the Southwark election, that in the opinion of the House it was inexpedient that the expenses at elections should be any longer left to the discretion of returning officers.

The Solicitor-General said the contract between returning officer and candidate beforehand was purely optional on both sides. In the absence of such contract the officer was bound by law to afford reasonable accommodation, recouping himself subsequently from the candidate, and in the Southwark case the officer had said that he should refuse to the candidate who declined to contract that reasonable accommodation which would put him on an equality with those who had contracted; a position which the officer had no right to take, and by which he incurred the risk of an action. The officer's position might be hard, but such by law it was. The subject should before long receive the attention of the Government.

Motion withdrawn.

Married Women's Property.—Mr. Russell Gurney introduced a bill.

Feb. 14.—The Vacant Common Law Judgeship.—In reply to Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Gladstone said that before the last general election three extra judges were appointed to try election petitions. That business had almost entirely gone by, and, consequently, the Government did not intend to fill up the vacancy. There was a special reason for not doing so now, because bills having reference to the higher courts of judicature had been announced in the Speech from the Throne. To remedy the inconvenience arising from the relative strength of the Judicial Bench in different courts pending the consideration of those measures, the Lord Chancellor would introduce a bill next week in the House of Lords.

The Ballot.—Mr. Leatham introduced a bill.

Merchant Shipping Law Consolidation.—Mr. Shaw-Lefevre obtained leave to introduce a bill.

Feb. 15.—Land Tenure (Ireland).—Mr. Gladstone obtained leave to introduce the Government bill.

Feb. 16.—Marriage with Deceased Wife's Sister.—Bill read the second time, without debate.

Electoral Disabilities of Women.—Bill introduced.

Summoning of Juries.—Bill to amend the law introduced.

Revesting of Mortgages.—Mr. Dodds introduced a bill to facilitate the revesting of mortgages in the mortgagors. The bill would not extend to Scotland.

OBITUARY.

MR. C. BECKINGTON.

Mr. Charles Beckington, who was for many years an attorney of Newcastle-on-Tyne, died there on the 1st of February, aged fifty-four years. He was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1835.

MR. C. J. SHEBBEARE.

We have to record the death of Mr. Charles John Shebbeare, Barrister-at-Law, which took place suddenly, at Surbiton Hill, on the 12th of February, at the age of seventy-six years. Mr. Shebbeare was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1841. He was called to the Bar at Gray's Inn in January, 1837, and practised for many years as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer.

MR. C. TAYLOR.

Mr. Charles Taylor, formerly a solicitor of Sunderland, died at Temple House, Surbiton Hill (the residence of his brother) on the 12th February, at the age of fifty-five years. The deceased gentleman was the eldest son of the late Mr. Thomas Taylor, of Sunderland; and we learn from a Law List for 1846 that he was then Clerk to the Commissioners appointed to carry out the provisions of the Bishopwearmouth Paving and Lighting Act. Soon after that time he seems to have retired from the profession, as his name has disappeared from subsequent issues.

MR. R. J. GAINSFORD.

The death of Mr. Robert John Gainsford, solicitor, of Sheffield, and of Durnall Hall, near that city, took place on the 6th February, at Rome, to which city (being a Roman Catholic) he went in November last, to attend the sittings of the Ecumenical Council. The late Mr. Gainsford took out his attorney's certificate in Easter Term, 1831, and was formerly in partnership with the late Mr. Edward Bramley, Town Clerk of Sheffield, and latterly with his son Mr. Herbert Bramley, under the style and title of Gainsford & Bramley. Mr. Gainsford held the office of registrar of marriages, &c., for Sheffield, and was secretary to the Liberal Association of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and fought the last two electoral battles successfully. He was also a member of the Roman Catholic Poor School Committee, and took part in the proceedings held at the Birmingham Town Hall, on the 15th November last, in support of the denominational system of education. He contributed to the periodical literature of the day, and was a writer for the Dublin Review. Mr. Gainsford was in his sixty-fourth year at the time of his death.

MR. T. FOWLE.

Mr. Thomas Fowle, solicitor, of Northallerton, in Yorkshire, expired on the 11th February. Mr. Fowle's certificate as a solicitor dates from Michaelmas Term, 1831, and he held the office of clerk to the Commissioners of Land, Income, and Assessed Taxes for the Northallerton district. He was also steward of the halmote court and all temporal courts within the manor of Allerton and Allertonshire, and steward of the respective manors of Thorntonlee-Moor, Morton-upon-Swale, and Welbury. Since 1859 he has been in partnership with his son, Mr. William Fowle.

Mr. Henry James, Q.C., M.P. for Taunton, has been elected a Bencher of the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple. Mr. James was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in January, 1852, and was created a Queen's Counsel in 1869.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on Tuesday the 15th inst., Mr. Hargreaves in the chair, the following question was discussed:—"Was the Government justified in suspending Mr. Madden from his office of magistrate, on account of the letter which he recently addressed to the Secretary for Ireland, declining the office of high sheriff?" Mr. Munton opened the debate in the affirmative, and when, after a very animated discussion the society divided, the number of votes on either side was found to be equal. The Chairman gave his casting vote in the affirmative, in which view the question was declared to be carried. The debate was well sustained throughout and was certainly the best that has taken place this session. The number of members present was twenty-eight.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A LAW BENEVOLENT CORPORATION.*

A relation of mine—a medical practitioner—sends three sons to the Medical College at Epsom. On enquiry, I find that they are educated at a very moderate cost, and that fifty boys, the sons of decayed medical men are boarded, lodged and taught there freely; moreover, that there is annexed to it an almshouse for decayed doctors, their widows and families. I then remembered the Charterhouse, for old decayed gentlemen and boys. And I said to myself—I had felt it for years, but it came up now in brighter colours—Why should not lawyers have a Law College, or (I preferred a term smacking more of antiquity) a Law House? I sat down and wrote the following circular:—

"21, Great George-street, Westminster, S.W., August 18, 1869.

"The Law House.

"My Dear Sir,—Permit me to beg your attention to my proposal to organise an Incorporated Institution for the benefit of decayed members of the legal profession and their families, and for the education of the children of members, under the above or some other appropriate title.

"There are Societies for the Education of the sons of members of the other professions, and of many branches of trade, and for aiding decayed members, and their widows and children. But the profession of the law has no such institution.

"It is true that there are two Societies who give annuities, or temporary relief, to decayed solicitors and their families; but the Solicitors' Benevolent Association is only enabled, at present, to give £475 a-year, and the older Law Association can only give £1,400 a year, and this is confined to Metropolitan Solicitors.

"There is then no institution for aiding decayed Barristers, their widows and children. There is no institution for educating, free of charge, or at a moderate rate, the children of either branch of the profession. There is only £475 a year for the Solicitors of all England, and £1,400 a year for those of the metropolis.

"Among the old foundations, the Charterhouse, and among new Societies, the Medical College at Epsom, form admirable models.

"At the latter, twenty-four pensioners, being aged medical men, or their widows, find a comfortable home, and the number will be increased. There are resident in the college 200 boys, the sons of medical men, fifty of whom as foundation scholars are educated, clothed, and maintained at the expense of the institution. The remainder (except a few exhibitors, who pay less) are charged £40 a year each for an education of the highest class, board, washing, use of books, &c.

"The experience of both these institutions points to the desirability of separating the buildings for the pensioners from the schools.

"As to the necessity of such an institution for lawyers, there can be no doubt. The directors of the Law Association, of whom I am one, have but too often to listen to details of the miseries of applicants which they cannot sufficiently relieve. The decayed barrister or solicitor keeps his miseries to himself—to divulge them would destroy all remaining hope of practice.

"Will you aid me in establishing an incorporated association, for the benefit of the legal profession, on the same footing as the medical college at Epsom.

"If twenty members of the two branches of the profession will join me, I will, adding their names to mine, issue a circular to the Lord Chancellor, and the whole profession, and lay the result before a general meeting.

"I will undertake all preliminary labour, and a large share of all subsequent labour, while life and health are spared, in any honorary position which may be thought best.

"JOHN M. CLABON."

This was sent as follows:—

Queen's counsel	21	} 36
Other barristers	15
London solicitors	150	} 220
Country solicitors	70

256

With all of whom I could claim such an acquaintance as enabled me to address them as "My dear sir."

The letters went out at an unfortunate time, just at the beginning of the Long Vacation, or I think I should have had more replies than the following:—

Queen's counsel	4	} 9
Other barristers	5
London solicitors	35	} 60
Country solicitors	25

69

Taking the question to be a general one, that of the propriety of giving more aid to poor lawyers, by educating their children, and by pensioning themselves and their families, the replies may be thus classified:—

	Favourable.		Unfavourable.
Queen's counsel	...	3	...	1
Other barristers	...	4	...	1
London solicitors	...	24	...	11
Country solicitors	...	20	...	5
	51		18

But the greater part of the unfavourable replies were founded on personal reasons, such as old age, pre-occupation, and the like. There were but three—one from a Queen's counsel, one from a London solicitor, and one from a country solicitor, which were decidedly hostile.

And I have the pleasure to add that I am at liberty to make use of 25 names—viz., 12 London solicitors, and 13 country solicitors of position, who will aid in the scheme.

But I have been talking generally. I need not tell you that in 69 letters, numerous opinions were expressed. These, with the reasons given for them, have led to the following modification in my ideas.

1. That it is not expedient to join the Bar and the attorneys and solicitors in one benevolent movement. There would be jealousy between them, and there is not enough evidence of a desire on the part of the Bar to join.

2. That it is not desirable to spend a large sum in buildings.

3. That class schools are not desirable.

4. That educational help will best be given by granting sums to those who want it, to enable them to send their sons and daughters to schools of their own selection.

5. That adults brought together into almshouses, and away from their families and friends and old neighbourhoods, come there unwillingly, and that such almshouses are apt to become places of restraint and scandal talking.

6. That help to decayed attorneys and solicitors and their families will best be given by pensions.

My scheme therefore resolves itself into one for granting pensions—

(1.) To aid the education of the sons and daughters of poor attorneys and solicitors.

(2.) To support themselves or their families.

Here arises a question which is much dwelt on by many of my correspondents, viz., That it is not expedient to multiply societies of similar objects, and that if a new Benevolent Society were established, it would injure the existing ones. I am much inclined to assent to this, as a general proposition; and I see no reason why the Solicitors' Benevolent Association (the Law Association is confined to the metropolis) should not join the new movement.

Mr. Kimber has already tried to join an educational branch to the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, but he met with no sufficient support.

The following was his proposal:—

"Outline of a Preliminary Proposal for the establishment of a College for the Sons of Solicitors and others.

"1. The basis and the object of this proposal is—

"The education of the sons of attorneys, solicitors and proctors in England and Wales, on the principle of a certain proportion (to be hereafter fixed) being provided with education and maintenance (or education only) at the expense of the college, and the remainder at the lowest rate practicable.

"The college not by any means to be an exclusive one—the sons of gentlemen other than attorneys to be admissible, but not at the same rates as sons of attorneys.

"Power to extend to sons of barristers the same advantage as to sons of attorneys and solicitors, if experience should shew it to be advantageous.

"2. The college is proposed to be in connection with the Solicitors' Benevolent Association in the following respects:—

"(1.) A certain number (to be fixed) of nominations for free education and maintenance in the college will be placed at the disposal of the board of that association for the benefit in the first instance of the orphans of its members, and afterwards, of sons of other members of the profession.

"(2.) The council of the college always to consist to the extent of at least one-third of its number of members of the board of that association. It is proposed that in the first instance all the members of that board willing to act shall, with the donors of the first ten sums of one hundred guineas each, constitute the provisional council, with power to add to their number.

"3. So soon as promises of donations to the extent of 1,000 guineas are received it is proposed under the approval of such intending donors to prepare and issue to the profession at large a detailed exposé of the proposition, with the names of the then intended provisional council, and of the arrangements for carrying it out practically and inviting further donations and subscriptions.

"4. Having recently myself offered to be one of ten to subscribe one hundred guineas each to make up the preliminary sum above proposed as a start, I have the satisfaction of announcing that I have already received the names of other gentlemen willing to give similar sums.

"5. The undersigned begs to request the favour of further promises for this object, such promises to be always conditional upon the detailed proposition when prepared being approved by the intending donor."

I think that the Solicitors' Benevolent Association made a great mistake in limiting the donations of life governors to ten guineas. I paid this sum, and thought I had done all that was expected of me, and no one has ever told me that I ought to do more. I suppose that all the life governors are in the same position.

I propose now to agitate the question through the whole of our branch of the profession. If the result be to add an educational branch to the other societies, and otherwise to increase their income and usefulness, I shall be satisfied. If the result be to constitute a new Law Benevolent Corporation, I hope it will be largely supported. I honestly think that we are wanting in our duty to our poorer brethren, and I earnestly ask every member of the profession to join in wiping away the stain.

The Marylebone Mercury says that for some time past a solicitor's clerk touting for business about the precincts of the Marylebone police court, and taking particulars in the officer's room, has become a great nuisance. Many complaints have been made by persons who have paid fees, and imagined that they would be represented by a solicitor, whereas only a clerk has appeared. A few days ago Mr. Montague Williams and Mr. Wontner, senr., complained of this practice to Mr. D'Eyncourt. Mr. Mansfield and Mr. D'Eyncourt have come to a determination to put a stop to such proceedings for the future. No clerk, whether articulated or managing, will be allowed to appear unless they produce an authority from their employer, and that direct from the office. It is a pity that all the police courts do not adopt the Worship-street plan (ante, p. 187).

Governor Fairchild recommends that the Legislature of Wisconsin submit to the people a constitutional amendment abolishing the grand jury system.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Hilary Term, 1870.

FINAL EXAMINATION.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

THOMAS DEWHURST LINGARD, who served his clerkship to Messrs. J. R. & R. Lingard & Rowell, of Manchester; and Messrs. Cunliffe and Beaumont, of London.

LIONEL BARNED MOZLEY, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Bateson, Robinson, & Morris, of Liverpool; and Messrs. Elmslie, Forsyth, & Sedgwick, of London.

AUGUSTUS BEDDALL, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Digby & Sharp, of London.

THOMAS STOCKWOOD, jun., who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Stockwood, of Bridgend, Glamorganshire.

OSWALD WALMESLEY, who served his clerkship to Mr. Thomas Frederick Taylor, of Wigan; and to Messrs. Gregory, Rowcliffes, & Rawle, of London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Lingard, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's-inn.

To Mr. Mozley, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clement's-inn.

To Mr. Beddall, Mr. Stockwood, and Mr. Walmesley, prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners also certified that the following candidates, under the age of 26, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

HARRY CAMPBELL BLAKER, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Clarke & Howlett, of Brighton; and Mr. John Baker, of London.

JOSEPH BENNETT CLARKE, who served his clerkship to Mr. Charles Bridges, of Birmingham; and Mr. Edwin Clarke, of Birmingham.

ROBERT MCTURN, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Rawson, George, & Wade, of Bradford, Yorkshire; and Messrs. Johnson & Weatherall, of London.

WILLIAM JOHN MANN, who served his clerkship to Mr. Rowland Rodway, of Trowbridge.

WALTER SHERBURNE PRIDEAUX, who served his clerkship to Mr. Walter Prideaux, of London.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The examiners further announced to the following candidate that his answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled him to a certificate of merit if he had not been above the age of 26:—

GEORGE JOHN VANDERPUMP, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Field, Roscoe, Field, & Francis, of London.

The number of candidates examined in this term was 115; of these 99 passed and 16 were postponed.

COURT PAPERS.

BUSINESS AT THE COMMON LAW JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

The following regulations for transacting the business at the judges' chambers, will be observed until further notice:—

Acknowledgments of deeds will be taken at eleven o'clock precisely.

Adjourned summonses, before the judge, will be heard at a quarter past eleven, and summonses of the day immediately afterwards.

Counsel will be heard at half past twelve o'clock.

Adjourned summonses, before the masters, will be heard at eleven o'clock precisely; the summonses of the day immediately afterwards, and counsel at twelve o'clock.

N.B.—The judge directs particular attention to the rule of Michaelmas Term, 1867, and desires it should be distinctly understood that he will not hear any summons or application, directed by the said rule to be heard by the masters.

GENERAL ORDER OF THE HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY, UNDER "THE DEBTORS ACT, 1869."

January 7, 1870.

The Right Honourable William Page Baron Hatherley, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable John, Lord Romilly, Master of the Rolls, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice, Sir George Markham Giffard, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor, Sir John Stuart, the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor, Sir Richard Malins, and the Honourable the Vice-Chancellor, Sir William Milbourne James, doth hereby, in pursuance and execution of the powers given to him by "The Debtors Act, 1869," and of all other powers and authorities enabling him in that behalf, order and direct in manner following:—

I.—Indorsement on Decrees and Orders.

1. The 10th rule of the 23rd of the Consolidated General Orders shall be varied, and as varied shall be as follows:—

Every decree or order made in any suit or matter, requiring any person to do an act thereby ordered, shall state the time, or the time after service of the decree or order, within which the act is to be done; and upon the copy of the decree or order which shall be served upon the person required to obey the same, there shall be indorsed a memorandum in the words or to the effect following, viz.:—"If you, the within named A.B., neglect to obey this decree [or order] by the time therein limited you will be liable to have your property sequestered for the purpose of compelling you to obey the same decree [or order], and you may also be liable to be arrested and committed to prison."

II.—Enforcing Decrees and Orders by Attachment, Seizure of Arms, and Sequestration.

2. The 3rd rule of the 29th of the Consolidated General Orders is hereby abrogated.

3. Where any person is by a decree or order made in any suit or matter directed to pay money or costs in a limited time, and, after due service of such decree or order, refuses or neglects to make such payment according to the exigency of such decree or order, the person prosecuting such decree or order shall, at the expiration of the time limited for such payment, be entitled to a commission of sequestration, which may be issued by the clerks of records and writs, without any special order, upon production of evidence to the same effect as that which would heretofore have been required on issuing a writ of attachment for default in making such payment.

4. The form of subpoena for costs mentioned in schedule E to the Consolidated General Orders shall be varied by omitting therefrom the words "an attachment issuing against your person, and:" provided always that where a subpoena is issued for costs payable under a decree or order, which states that payment thereof may be enforced by attachment, as mentioned in the 9th rule of this order, then the subpoena shall be in the form heretofore used.

5. Where any person is, by a decree or order made in any suit or matter, directed to pay costs, without a time being limited for such payment, and does not upon due service of a subpoena for such costs make such payment, the person to whom such costs are payable shall, immediately upon such default, be entitled to a commission of sequestration, which may be issued by the clerks of records and writs without any special order, upon production of evidence to the same effect as that which would heretofore have been required on issuing a writ of attachment for default in making such payment.

6. Where any person is by a decree or order made in any suit or matter directed to do any act other than or besides the payment of money or costs, and, after due service of such decree or order, refuses or neglects to do such act according to the exigency of the same decree or order, the person prosecuting such decree or order shall, at the expiration of the time limited for the performance thereof, be entitled to a writ or writs of attachment against the disobedient person. And in case such person shall be taken or detained in custody under any such writ of attachment without obeying the same decree or order, then the person prosecuting the same decree or order shall, upon the sheriff's return that the disobedient person has been so taken or detained, be entitled to a commission of sequestration against his estate and effects. And in case the sheriff shall make the return non est inventus to such writ or writs of attachment, the person prosecuting such decree or order shall be entitled at his option, either to a commission of sequestration in the first instance, or otherwise to an order for the serjeant-at-arms, and to such other process as he was formerly entitled to upon a return non est inventus made by the commissioners named in a commission of rebellion issued for the non-performance of a decree or order.

7. Where, by any decree or order, a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity is ordered to pay in a limited time any sum of money in his possession or under his control, or a solicitor is ordered to pay in a limited time costs for misconduct as such solicitor, or to pay in a limited time a sum of money in his character of an officer of the court, and such trustee, person, or solicitor, after due service of such decree or order, neglects or refuses to pay such money or costs according to the exigency of such decree or order, the person prosecuting such decree or order shall, at the expiration of the time limited thereby for the performance thereof, be entitled at his option either to a commission of sequestration to be obtained in manner provided by the 3rd rule of this order, or (subject nevertheless as mentioned in rule 9) to the remedies to which under the 6th rule of this order he would have been entitled in the case of failure to do some act directed by the decree or order other than payment of money.

8. Where, by any decree or order, a solicitor is ordered to pay costs for misconduct as such solicitor, without a time being limited for such payment, and does not upon due service of a subpoena for such costs, make such payment, the person to whom such costs are payable shall, immediately upon such default, be entitled, at his option, either to a commission of sequestration to be obtained in manner provided by the 5th rule of this order, or (subject nevertheless as mentioned in the next following rule) to a writ or writs of attachment and such other process as has heretofore been applicable in case of non-payment of costs recoverable by subpoena.

9. Any decree or order directing any such trustee person or solicitor as mentioned in the last two preceding rules to make any such payment as in the same rules mentioned, shall state that such payment may be enforced by attachment, and unless the decree or order contains such statement, no attachment shall be issued for enforcing such payment without leave of the court or the judge in chambers, to be applied for by motion or summons, which application may be granted ex parte, upon the court or judge being satisfied that the case comes within the exceptions contained in the 4th section of "The Debtors Act, 1869," unless the court or judge thinks fit to require notice of such application to be served.

III.—Committal to Prison, under Section 5 of "The Debtors Act, 1869."

10. Every application to commit to prison under the 5th section of "The Debtors Act, 1869," shall be made by motion on notice, and the practice applicable to motions to commit for breach of an injunction shall, so far as the same is not inconsistent with the said Act or with anything in these rules, be applicable to such applications.

11. The court, upon the hearing of any such application, may, if it shall see fit so to do, instead of refusing or granting the application, adjourn the same, and either give leave to adduce further evidence, or direct an inquiry in chambers, as to the means of the person making default, or require the production and oral examination before itself of the person making default, and any persons who have given evidence against or in support of the application, or of such of them as the court may think fit, in the same manner as such production and oral examination might be required at the hearing of a cause.

12. In case any such inquiry as aforesaid shall be directed, the general course of proceeding and practice at the judge's chambers, as provided by statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, and the General Orders of the court relative thereto, shall apply to all proceedings under such inquiry.

13. The court, in making an order for committal to prison under the said 5th section, may either make such imprisonment determinable on payment of the whole sum in respect of which the person to be imprisoned is in default, together with such costs as the court shall think fit, or may order the debt to be paid by such instalments as the court shall think fit, and make the imprisonment determinable on payment of such costs, and such of the said instalments as the court shall think fit, and in either of such cases the court, if it shall think fit, may direct payment of a sum in gross in lieu of taxed costs.

14. No application made under the said 5th section, nor any order made thereon, shall in any manner vary or suspend any of the remedies which the person prosecuting the decree or order which has been disobeyed, would, if no such application had been made, have been entitled to, against the property of the person disobeying the same decree or order, but the person prosecuting such decree or order may proceed to avail himself of such remedies without any regard to such application, or to any order made thereon, except so far as by consent, he may, by such last-mentioned order, be expressly restrained from availing himself of such remedies.

15. Orders of committal may be in the form A 1, or A 2, in the schedule hereto, as the case may be, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require, and an office copy of each such order shall be delivered to the sheriff or other officer required to execute the same. Office copies of any such order may be delivered concurrently to different sheriffs for execution in different counties. Every such office copy as aforesaid shall be indorsed by the clerks of records and writs, with the direction of the sheriff or other officer by whom the same is to be executed. The sheriff and officer shall be entitled to the same fees in respect of an order of committal, as are now payable upon a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, issued out of her Majesty's courts of common law.

16. The sheriff or other officer to whom an order of committal is directed as aforesaid, shall within two days after the arrest, indorse upon the office copy of the order delivered to him the true date of such arrest, and return the same so indorsed to the solicitor of the person prosecuting the decree or order, or to such person himself, if he acts in person.

17. Upon payment of the sum or sums in that behalf mentioned in the order of committal, including the sheriff's fees, and the costs or gross sum in lieu of costs made payable by the order, the person committed shall be entitled to a certificate in the form B. in the schedule hereto, or to the like effect, signed by the solicitor of the person prosecuting the decree or order which has been disobeyed, or if such person be acting in person, then signed by him, and attested by a solicitor or justice of the peace.

18. In case any order is made under the 5th section of the said act for payment of a sum of money by instalments, and the person imprisoned shall, after his discharge from prison, neglect or refuse to pay the subsequent instalments, or any of them, the person prosecuting the decree or order for disobedience to which the committal was ordered, shall, in addition to his remedies against the property of the person making default, be entitled to enforce payment of such subsequent instalments by attachment, as in the case of disobedience to an order directing the performance of some act other than payment of money.

IV.—Miscellaneous.

19. The general practice of the court shall, in all cases not provided for by "The Debtors Act, 1869," or these rules, and so far as the same is applicable, and not inconsistent with the said act or these rules, apply to all proceedings under the 4th and 5th sections of the said Act.

20. The charges to be allowed to solicitors for duties performed in respect of such proceedings as last aforesaid, and the fees of court in respect of the same proceedings, shall be the same as those allowable and payable in respect of other proceedings of the same nature in the causes or matters in which such proceedings respectively are taken.

21. This Order shall be read and construed as part of the General Consolidated Orders of the court, and the interpretation clause in the same Consolidated General Orders contained shall apply to the rules of this order.

22. This Order shall come into operation on the 11th day of January, 1870.

SCHEDULE.

A. 1.

Upon motion, &c., this Court doth order that the said A. B. do pay to the said — the sum of £—, as and for his costs of and incident to this application and this order, and further that the said A. B., for default in payment of the sum of £— mentioned in the said decree [or, order] of the — day of —, 18—, be committed to prison for the term of six weeks from the date of his arrest, including the day of such date, unless he shall sooner pay the said sum of £—, and sheriff's fees for the execution of this order, and the costs hereinbefore directed to be paid [or, and the said sum of £— for costs]. And it is ordered that any sheriff or officer to whom an office copy of this order shall be delivered, after being directed to him by the clerks of records and writs, do take the said A. B. for the purpose aforesaid if he be found within his bailiwick.

A. 2.

Upon motion, &c., this Court doth order that the said A. B. do pay to the said — [the sum of £—, as and for] his costs of and incident to this application and this order, and further that the said A. B., for default in payment of the sum of £— mentioned in the said decree [or, order] of the — day of —, 18—, be committed to prison for the term of six weeks from the date of his arrest, including the day of such date, unless he shall sooner pay the sheriff's fees for the execution of this order and the costs hereinbefore directed to be paid [or, and the sum of £—, hereinbefore directed to be paid for costs], and the sum of £—, part of the said sum of £—. And it is ordered that the said A. B. do pay [state to whom or to what account to be paid] the sum of £—, the residue of the said sum of £—, by — equal instalments on [state times of payment]. And it is ordered that any sheriff or officer to whom an office copy of this order shall be delivered, after being directed to him by the clerks of records and writs, do take the said A. B. for the purpose aforesaid, if he be found within his bailiwick.

B.

I certify that A. B., now in the goal of —, upon an order of the High Court of Chancery, dated the — day of —, 18—, made in the above cause [or, matter] until payment of £—, has paid the said sum, together with the [the sum of £— for] costs mentioned in the said order, and sheriff's fees.

HATHERLEY, C.
ROMILLY, M.R.
G. M. GIFFARD, L.J.
J. STUART, V.C.
R. MALINS, V.C.
W. M. JAMES, V.C.

The Hon. David Robert Plunket, Q.C., of the Irish Bar, has been returned to Parliament (unopposed) as member for the University of Dublin, in the room of Mr. Anthony Lefroy, who has resigned. Mr. Plunket, the new member, is the third son of the present Lord Plunket, Q.C., of the Irish Bar, by Charlotte, daughter of the late Right Hon. Charles Kendal Bushe, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench in Ireland. Mr. Plunket was born in 1838, and was called to the bar in Ireland in Hilary Term, 1862, being created a Queen's Counsel in 1868. He held the office of Law Adviser to the Crown in Ireland, for a few days in December, 1868, previous to the retirement of Mr. Disraeli's Government. Mr. Plunket is a grandson of the famous William Conyngham, first Lord Plunket, who, having attained the highest eminence at the bar, and filled successively the offices of Solicitor-General and Attorney-General for Ireland, obtained his peerage by patent, in June, 1827, on being appointed to the Chief Justiceship of the Irish Court of Common Pleas. In 1830 Lord Plunket was nominated Lord Chancellor of Ireland, which office he held till 1841, with the exception of the short interval of Sir Robert Peel's Government from 1834 to 1835.

The Right Hon. Sir William Erle, D.C.L., late Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, has been created an honorary fellow of New College, Oxford. Having been first a scholar of Winchester, he became in due time a fellow of New College, whence he proceeded to the bar. Sir William took his degree of B.C.L. on the 17th December, 1818, and was raised to the degree of D.C.L., by decree of Convocation, on the 18th June, 1857, when his father-in-law (the Rev. D. Williams, warden of New College) was Vice-Chancellor of the University.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds opened with firmness at a slight advance, and since then have scarcely experienced a fluctuation. Foreign securities have been in moderate demand, and the railway market pretty steady. Several new joint-stock concerns have been brought out in telegraph construction works, and after the late eager speculation in telegraph companies, have been rather well received. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's plan for consolidating the new £3 per cents. and reduced £3 per cents. would, it is thought, be an undoubted success, if only the Government would forego the charge of 5s.

LOCAL TAXATION ASSESSMENTS.—The Local Taxation Committee, on the motion of Mr. C. S. Read, M.P., in July last offered a premium of £50 for the best essay on "the injustice, inequalities and anomalies of the present poor-rate assessment, and the incidence of other local burdens in England and Wales." Of the sixteen essays sent in, the three best were selected by the adjudicators for final judgment, and two of these were the work of Mr. C. F. Gardner, B.A., Stoke Damerell, Devonport, and Mr. Frederick G. Luke, LL.B., Barrister-at-Law. The prize was awarded to Mr. Gardner, and his essay will be published by the committee forthwith.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—A return which has been presented to Parliament showing the bankruptcy statistics of the last year is the final record of the operation of the system now superseded by the Act of last session. In the year ending the 11th of October, 1869, there were in England and Wales 10,306 bankruptcies, an increase of 1,200 over the number in the preceding year; but the increase was mainly in bankruptcies on the application of the debtor himself: as many as 7,530 are described as being on the petition of the debtor, and 806 others as on petition in forma pauperis. In the course of the year £644,404 was realised from bankrupts' estates. The proceedings of the year show a dividend paid in 1,695 cases, but there were no less than 7,346 cases in which there was no dividend. In 953 cases, much more than half of those paying a dividend, it was under 2s. 6d.; in only 114 did it exceed or reach 10s. The year was the first under Mr. Moffatt's Act of 1868 relating to trust deeds, and designed to prevent collusion and discharges from debt by means of fraudulent arrangements, and the Act appears to have had a marked effect. In the previous year there were 8,046 trust deeds registered, and the unsecured debts were £21,236,197; in 1869 there were only 4,668 debts, and the debts were £10,408,589. The composition deeds decreased from 5,246 to 2,527; the unsecured debts under those deeds, from £9,276,545 to £4,354,862; the composition paid, from £3,592,900 to £1,760,908. The rate of composition paid shows improvement. The compositions at less than 2s. 6d. in the pound decreased from 1,390 to 310; at 6s. or more, from 2,300 to 1,483, or much less than the decrease in the number of composition deeds. The number paying in full declined from 308 to 100, but that is an exceptional class at all times.—Times.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 26, 1870.

IN SOME REMARKS (13 S. J. 996) upon the West Kent Legal and Mercantile Institute we stated our belief that Mr. Albert Henry Elworthy, a solicitor concerned in that institution, had, in June, 1867, been convicted of perjury by a jury at the Central Criminal Court, and that he had afterwards received a free pardon. We have since ascertained the fact to be that the conviction was subsequently quashed by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved upon the following point. The assignment of perjury relied on at the trial consisted in a statement made by the prisoner upon oath, that there was no draft of a certain statutory declaration. No notice to produce the draft in question had been given to the prisoner, but secondary evidence was admitted. The Court for Crown Cases Reserved held that, notice to produce the draft not having been given, the secondary evidence was inadmissible to prove the contents of the draft, and the conviction was in consequence quashed. We regret, of course, that we should have made a statement incorrectly representing the facts as to Mr. Elworthy, and as Mr. Elworthy has complained of the statement made by us, we have now made this correction.* At the same time we cannot but express our surprise that Mr. Elworthy should feel aggrieved at the error into which we were inadvertently betrayed, inasmuch as a free pardon is usually considered as implying that the conviction has been deemed wrong on its merits.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER COLUMN the bill now before the House of Commons for Amending the Law relating to the Remuneration of Attorneys and Solicitors. The subject is one which needs no recommendation to commend it to the attention of either lawyers or the public. At present, as everyone knows, a solicitor (and we include attorneys in the term) cannot bind his client by any contract as to professional remuneration; no such agreement overrides the client's right to have the costs taxed in the usual manner, though such a contract might, as against the solicitor, have the effect of limiting the amount recoverable by him in an action for payment of work performed. Nor can the solicitor take any security for future costs. The bill proposes to confer upon the solicitor a very wide power of contracting with his client, not only as to the amount of his remuneration, but as to his liability for negligence. After such an agreement a taxation of costs can take place only upon the client proving the agreement to be tainted by fraud or surprise. The bill also empowers

* We subjoin the headnote (taken from the Law Reports, 1 C. C. R. 103) of the report of the decision questioning the conviction:—

THE QUEEN v. ELWORTHY.
Evidence—Notice to produce.

The prisoner, a solicitor, was indicted for perjury in having sworn that there was no draft of a certain statutory declaration made by a client. No notice to produce the draft had been given to the prisoner; and upon his trial it was proved to have been last seen in his possession, secondary evidence having been given of its contents.

Held, that, in the absence of such notice, secondary evidence was inadmissible.

the solicitor to take security for future costs. It further reverses the rule that a solicitor trustee can only charge costs when specially authorised in the trust instrument, by enacting that he shall be allowed to charge such costs, unless the instrument otherwise directs.

It is very desirable that the system of lawyers' remuneration should be amended. It cannot be denied that the present system affords a temptation to multiply technicalities, simply because much real work is remunerated on quite an inadequate scale. The payment of conveying by length, the absurdity of which has been pointed out by Mr. Joshua Williams, affords an illustration of the principle at work. As Lord Langdale observed in Davenport v. Stafford (8 Beav. 517), "It is much easier to censure than to remedy this state of things, which, under all circumstances, is more to be regretted than blamed. The blame which there may be is more with higher authorities than with the solicitors, who, having regard to the rules of taxation, cannot help themselves. The remedy, if any is to be found, must be had by the discovery of more improved modes of remunerating solicitors, by which the remuneration may on every occasion be adequate to the real and just value of the important services which are rendered." Our readers can now judge for themselves of the remedy provided by the bill now before the Legislature. We shall, of course, return to the subject, but we must, in the meantime, reiterate the opinion which we expressed when Lord Westbury's bill of 1864 was pending, that in any measure of the kind a line should be drawn between litigious and non-litigious business. We must also express our regret that the bill leaves untouched the defects in the principles on which costs are now taxed by the Court. In 1840 a special committee of the Incorporated Law Society, after reproaching the principle of making length of documents the scale of remuneration, advocated the appointment of a taxing board.

MR. DENMAN and MR. LOCKE KING have brought in a short bill to amend the "Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869." The preamble of the bill states that "doubts have arisen as to the extent and meaning of the words 'court of justice' and 'peculiar judge,' in the 4th section of the Act of 1869. It is then proposed to enact that these words "shall be deemed to include any person or persons having by law, or by consent of parties, authority to hear, receive, and examine evidence." The object of the bill, therefore, is to extend the making of "the promise or declaration" provided by the 4th section of the Act of 1869, to witnesses examined in arbitrations under 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, as well as under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. This section seems to apply only to voir dire evidence, and not to affidavits, as the phraseology is "any person called to give evidence." Persons making affidavits, therefore, must do so upon oath, unless they come within the scope of section 20 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. It would be desirable, if the 4th section of the Act of 1869 is to be amended at all, to introduce some words which would extend it to the making of affidavits as well as to voir dire evidence. There would thus be a uniformity in the law on the substitution of a declaration for an oath.

Lastly, while amending the Act of 1869, it would be desirable to set at rest the doubt which there is, whether witnesses under sections 2 and 3 of that Act are compellable to answer questions or only competent. In the supplement to the third edition of "Powell on Evidence" Messrs. Cutler & Griffin express an opinion that such witnesses are compellable as well as competent except where they are protected by the proviso to section 3, and this would seem to be the fair construction to put upon the explanation of the Act which Lord Penzance gave to the Prince of Wales on his entering the witness-box in the Mordaunt case.

THE CASE OF Mordaunt v. Mordaunt, which has occupied the Divorce Court for so many days, raises an important question of law. The petitioner seeks to obtain a dissolution of his marriage on the ground of the respondent's adultery. The citation was served on the respondent on the 30th of April, 1869. Subsequently, an application on her behalf was made to stay the proceedings on the ground that she was of unsound mind, and unable to prepare her defence. It has been admitted by the petitioner's counsel that the respondent is now insane; and the question is therefore whether, on the 30th of April, or at any and what time afterwards, she was of sound mind. There is no question now as to the respondent's state of mind before the 30th of April.

The present inquiry is founded upon the assumption that it is an answer to a suit for dissolution of marriage that the respondent is then insane. We believe the only direct authority on this point is Barnden v. Barnden (10 W. R. 292) where it was held that a suit for dissolution of marriage cannot be maintained against a lunatic. It has been decided that a lunatic can prosecute a suit for nullity of marriage, Earl of Portsmouth v. Countess of Portsmouth (1 Hagg. Ecc. 356), Hancock v. Peaty (Law Rep. 16 D. M. 335); or for divorce, Parnell v. Parnell (2 Hagg. Const. 169); and a minor can sue for a divorce, Barham v. Barham (1 Hagg. Const. 5) and Morgan v. Morgan (2 Curt. 679), and be made respondent in a suit for divorce: Beauraine v. Beauraine (1 Hagg. Const. 498). These appear to be the only cases in the Ecclesiastical or Divorce Courts at all bearing on the question involved in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt.

In ordinary civil proceedings the lunacy of a plaintiff or defendant is no bar to an action for a wrong committed before lunacy. In criminal proceedings, on the other hand, the lunacy of the accused is an absolute bar to his trial. This is usually stated to be because a lunatic cannot provide for his defence. There is, however, a further reason, viz., that a trial would be a useless proceeding, because by a very old principle a lunatic cannot be punished for his crimes committed when sane (3 Inst. 6). This principle has been frequently recognised in statutes. In Barnden v. Barnden the Court followed the analogy of criminal rather than of civil proceedings, and allowed the lunacy of the respondent to be a bar to the petition. There seems, however, to be some strong reasons against this decision which possibly might not be followed if the point were argued in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt.

The object of criminal proceedings is the punishment of the offender, not the benefit of the person injured, who in theory has no control over the proceedings. There is no question as to the character of the prosecutor, and the question is solely whether the crime has, in fact, been committed. The object of a suit for dissolution of marriage is very different. No punishment can be inflicted on the respondent; the proceedings are directly for the benefit of the petitioner, who can institute or refrain from instituting them, and can stop them at his pleasure, and the petitioner may by his own previous misconduct be deprived of his right to the relief prayed for (section 37 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85.) It is, no doubt, a serious thing for a respondent to be liable to have his or her status altered by a decree made during incapacity to resist, but to hold that under no circumstances whatever can this be done may cause very great hardship to a petitioner. Whatever may be the ultimate decision it would be well that the matter should receive more consideration than seems to have been given to it in Barnden v. Barnden.*

WE HAVE ONLY BEEN ABLE to obtain a copy of the Jurisdiction of the Judges Bill, which has been introduced into the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor, as we were about to go to press, and of course it is not easy to form a definite opinion as to its probable working, without a careful perusal. We understood, however, from the speech of the Chancellor that it was to provide that a judge of any one of the common law courts may sit as a judge of any other of the courts; that each court may be divided and sit at the same time as two courts, and may also hold as many nisi prius courts as may be expedient. Besides this, the Home Circuit is to be abolished, and in its place there are to be sittings in Middlesex and London during the circuits. This, however, is to be done by a subsequent bill.

We have constantly advocated the transfer of business from one court to another, which is something similar to the scheme proposed of a transfer of judges from one court to the other from time to time. It is not, however, quite the same thing, and whether it will be equally efficacious is, in our opinion, somewhat doubtful. It can hardly be considered that the practice of taking two judges from the other courts to the Divorce Court to form the full court has worked well. We presume the idea is that whenever the business of any court requires two courts to be sitting in banc at the same time, the Chief Justice is to send to the Chiefs of the other courts and request the loan of a judge or two to help make up the second court, and if this request should not be complied with, or the necessity for it should be disputed, of course the matter must drop. Much, therefore, depends upon unanimity between the Chief Justices; and by the bill, as drawn, compliance with the request is to be entirely optional with the judges requested to assist. One point deserves notice—viz., that although the substitution of a new court of appeal for the Exchequer Chamber is to be provided for by a subsequent bill, yet it is an essential part of the scheme, for otherwise the appeal from judges sitting temporarily in a court not their own, would be to themselves in the Exchequer Chamber. It is however, in the trial of cases at Nisi Prius that the bill, if it had been well drawn and acted on in good faith by the judges and associates, might do most good. If it comes to be understood that any judge sitting at Nisi Prius, who has finished his list for the day at an early hour, is, instead of rising, to take cases from the day's list of any other Nisi Prius judge who requires assistance, the present necessity for putting a large number of cases in the list every day will be avoided. As it is, unless a long list is made, if the cases inserted prove shorter than the average, time is lost, and to obviate this long lists are made and parties are constantly kept waiting about the courts for days before their case is reached. Under the new system, if acted on as we suggest, the number of cases in each day's list may fairly be reduced to about half the present number, and then there will be no reason why the cases on the list should not be cleared off from day to day, without the monstrous waste of time and expense which now takes place. We doubt, however, whether the bill, as drawn, would enable this to be done. It appears to us to require considerable amendment, without which it is likely to be practically inoperative.

The abolition of the Home Circuit will, so far as the interests of suitors having causes for trial are concerned, be an unqualified benefit. The Lord Chancellor said nothing about the criminal business, but the greater part of it certainly can be conveniently disposed of at the Central Criminal Court.

The alteration will, however, strike a great blow at the whole circuit system, so far as the Bar are concerned. The Middlesex sittings, held during circuit, must, we think, be open to the whole Bar, as the Middlesex sittings at other times are; and this being so, it is obvious that the present members of the Home Circuit must in their turn be allowed by their brethren to practise in other circuits without special retainers. Whether they do this by each selecting one other circuit, or by going where they like, the whole system will have been broken in upon. There will no doubt grow up a bar which will attend regularly in London and Middlesex during the circuits, and who will not go elsewhere without special fees, still this bar cannot be an exclusive one, as the present circuit bars are.

* Since the above was written, the jury in this case have returned a verdict that Lady Mordaunt was insane on the 30th of April, 1869.

THE BILL which was to be laid on the table of the House of Lords last night, so far as can be gathered from the Lord Chancellor's description of it last week, may be accepted as the first fruits of the labours of the Judicature Commission. Writing as we do, without having seen either the bill itself or the Lord Chancellor's remarks last night, and even in ignorance whether it has been actually produced, we are compelled to rely on this description, which is, we doubt not, substantially accurate.

The principle of the bill may be taken to be the establishment of a central court of appeal from all the superior courts, to consist of five permanent and four moveable judges, and to sit in chambers or divisions of not less than three judges each. This at once supplies the requisite elements for a really strong court of appeal, and if worked so as to utilise to the maximum the judicial strength thus supplied, may go far towards producing that harmony in our laws and uniformity in our decisions of which they are at present so much in need. But to this end it will be requisite:—

1st. That the judges of this Court should sit indiscriminately in its different chambers, and should even make a point of shifting their combinations as much as possible, consistently with the conduct of the business; so that, except where the occurrence of "part heard" cases rendered it necessary, the same three judges should not continue to sit in the same chamber for more than some very limited period, say a week. This provision is obviously necessary to secure general harmony of decision, for if the same three judges habitually sat together, we should soon find that the divergence now experienced in the tendencies of different courts would re-appear as between the different chambers of the Court of Appeal, each of which would become more or less strongly impressed with the character of that one of its members (and there always would be some one) who acquired the largest share of influence. Two men may—though they seldom do—continue to sit together without either becoming habitually predominant over the other; but with three this is practically impossible. With more than three, again, the Court may, as we see at this moment in the Court of Exchequer, become broken into two parties, each of which habitually follows its own leader; but it is more frequently the case that one mind becomes the virtual ruler of the whole Court, and this is the very thing we wish to avoid.

2ndly. The "nominated judges" (i.e., those who are to be appointed for a year only, subject to reappointment) ought, as far as practicable, to sit in different chambers, and the rule ought to be, except in very special cases, not to reappoint them without an interval of at least two years. The very object of their appointment at all is to keep up the circulation between the courts of first instance and the Court of Appeal, and to that end there should be one of these judges (who will, we presume, be always selected from the acting judges of first instance, and will return to their functions as such at the end of their year), associated with the permanent judges of the Court at every sitting thereof; and, moreover, such judges should be sufficiently fresh from the performance of their ordinary duties to prevent their assimilation to the permanent staff of the Court.

3rdly. All final appeals from inferior courts should be to this Court, either with or without an intermediate appeal as may be thought desirable. The present system, whereby the same identical question may, at the option of the plaintiff, be brought before a judge of first instance, either in the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction—in which case his decision is subject to two appeals—or on appeal from an inferior court—in which case it is final*—is a palpable absurdity, and amounts in fact to a denial of justice to the poorer litigant. Had the existing Court of Appeal in Chancery been continued it would, we think, have been necessary to transfer the appeal from the county courts sitting in equity to that Court, and as it is now to be merged in a general court of appeal, that Court should, we think, be given the like jurisdiction; and the same principle evidently applies to appeals from all inferior courts.

There are, moreover, some minor details in the proposed measure, which, we think, call for observation. We fail to see the force of the argument so often advanced for placing the Master of the Rolls ex officio in the Court of Appeal;† that the Lords Justices, who of course will be members of that Court, are his inferiors in judicial precedence. This objection was conclusively answered, when advanced by Lord Chancellor Cranworth, by no less an authority than the Master of the Rolls himself, who pointed out the inconvenience of the alteration then proposed, and said that the true course would be, if it was thought worth while, to alter the precedence of the Lords Justices. But in truth, whatever might have been said for Lord Cranworth's proposition, which dealt only with the Court of Chancery, the present bill carries its own answer on its face, for it is not proposed to make the Lord Chief Justice of England an ex officio member of the Court of Appeal, nor either of the other Common Law Chiefs, and yet the first-named judge is the judicial superior of the Master of the Rolls himself, and all three of them are as much entitled to precedence over the Lords Justices as is the Master of the Rolls. Nor, so far as we have heard, does the bill propose to give any precedence whatever to the nominated judges as such during their year of office. We are sorry also that the niggardly spirit which has lately manifested itself in high places has so far prevailed that the recommendations of the commissioners in favour of ten judges of this court has been negatived. Nine judges, of whom the Lord Chancellor is one, means eight on all ordinary occasions during the Parliamentary session, and eight judges implies but two chambers sitting simultaneously, which again supplies an excuse for closing the doors of the Court against some of those classes of appeals which, as we have already said, we think ought to find their way there. We hope that before the bill becomes law, which we trust it will do without any unnecessary delay, better counsels will so far prevail that this objection may be removed.

THE FOLLOWING CIRCULAR, relating to the stamp duty on marine policies effected abroad, has been forwarded to us for publication:—

"Inland Revenue, Somerset House, W.C.
January, 1870.

Sir,—It having been represented to the Board of Inland Revenue that it is the practice of certain insurance companies to pay claims on policies of marine insurance effected abroad, without requiring such policies to be first duly stamped, the board deem it proper to call the attention of the several marine insurance companies to the law upon the subject.

I am accordingly desired to state that by the 15th section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, it is enacted 'that the stamp duties chargeable under that or any other Act for the time being in force upon or in respect of any policy of insurance of any description shall extend to and be deemed to be payable upon and in respect of any policy or other instrument of insurance which shall be made or signed out of the United Kingdom, by or on behalf of any person carrying on the business of insurance within the United wife may at the option of either party, and irrespective of the amount in dispute be referred either to Vice-Chancellor Stuart or the county court judge of the district. If the parties apply first to the latter his decision may be appealed to Vice-Chancellor Stuart whose decision is final, but if they have gone at once to the Vice-Chancellor, the dissatisfied party may take the case to the House of Lords.

† Of course no one will so misunderstand us as to suppose we object to the appointment of Lord Romilly individually to that Court.

* If our readers wish to see a notable instance of this absurdity—pushed to extreme—they will find it in the bills to protect the property of married women, mentioned elsewhere in our columns. By the 10th section of Bill No. 1 (which is identical with the 12th section of Bill No. 2), any question between husband and

Kingdom, or by which, according to any stipulation, agreement or undertaking, expressed or implied, any loss or damage or sum of money shall be payable or recoverable in the United Kingdom, upon the happening of any contingency whatever, and no such policy or other instrument of insurance shall be valid or available in the United Kingdom, for any purpose whatever, unless the same shall be duly stamped for denoting the duties.'

I am further to point out that under the 13th section of the Act, 30 Vict. c. 23, persons paying claims on such policies not so stamped, incur a penalty of £100 in every instance.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

T. SARGENT."

The subject-matter of this circular, which addresses itself alike to lawyers and to the shipping and insurance interests, was a matter of public comment about three years ago.* At that time a correspondent of the Times expressed the opinion that, beyond the invalidity of the unstamped policy, the Legislature had not, by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, s. 15, inflicted any penalty on default in paying the duty on marine policies effected abroad. The view in question was fortified by an opinion stated to have been delivered by an eminent barrister, to the same effect. In point of fact, however, the 4th section of 7 Vict. c. 21, at that time in force, enacted the opposite, for that section rendered any person paying any such policy, or being concerned in any omission with intent to evade the stamp duty, liable to a penalty of £100. Shortly after the topic was thus before the public, the consolidating or rather condensing Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, was passed, which, leaving untouched the 15th section of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, repealed the 4th section of 7 Vict. c. 21, and re-enacted the substance of the latter section in section 13 of its own. The Stamp Acts relating to marine and other policies are only one instance of the necessity for a thorough revision and consolidation of the stamp laws. That they are such an instance is corroborated, if corroboration were needful, by the fact that even the Government Index, just published by authority (which we notice in another column) has gone wrong on the subject, and omits both 7 Vict. c. 21 and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96 from the list of enactments in force relating to marine policies.

IT WAS ALLEGED last year during the debates on the "Debtors Act" that registrars of county courts had, without the slightest legal power to do so, committed debtors to prison. No individual registrar was named, but the Government must have had good reason for believing that registrars had so acted, otherwise the prohibition contained in section 5 of the Act would have been unnecessary. It is true, that under the various County Courts Acts, registrars were nowhere prohibited from exercising the power of committal, but they are nowhere authorised to do so. Some registrars appear to be under the impression that they may do whatever they are not in express terms prohibited from doing. As a case in point, we find from a report in the Clerkenwell News that on the 15th inst., the registrar of Clerkenwell County Court sat as judge and tried a cause which was strongly contested, notwithstanding that the provisions of the 16th section of the "County Courts Act, 1867," only authorise registrars to decide undefended causes "if founded on contract." Here again there is no express prohibition as to the registrar trying any cause, but if the absence of prohibition is to be read as giving authority the registrar may exercise nearly all the powers of the judge.

THE PROMISED BILLS to protect the property of married women have made their appearance—two in number. Of that which bears the Recorder's name little need be said; it is little more than a reproduction of the bill brought in by Mr. Shaw Lefevre in 1868, and renewed last session, on which we have already commented at length, and it is open to all the observations, favourable and otherwise, which we made in reference to that bill. The other bill, which is fathered by Mr. Raikes, Mr. Staveley Hill, Q.C., and the Attorney-General of the County Palatine, is a very different production, and one which, though not free from objection, contains, we think, the germ of a sound and useful measure. Its principal fault is one but too prevalent—it is too detailed. Instead of altering the principle of the law, and leaving the Courts to carry the new principles into effect in their own way, it aims too much at providing all the machinery for the purpose, down to the very smallest detail. The necessary consequence is, that the Courts say, "We can do nothing except by the machinery prescribed, and if there be a case which this won't fit, however clearly within the scope of the Act, it is a casus omissus, and we can do nothing with it." The particular provisions of this bill moreover do not seem to us well adapted to the end proposed, and in particular we take special objection to the system of heaping all sorts of jurisdiction "in a huddled manner" on those "judicial beasts of burden," the county court judges.

Again, we think the bill goes too far in its application to persons already married, and that, as to them it should at least, be confined to cases of separation, voluntary or judicial. Further, there can be no reason, that we can see, for interfering, in ordinary cases, with the rule which gives all the property of an intestate wife to a surviving husband, at any rate in cases where they are living together. This rule is founded on the natural and reasonable theory that a woman by marriage becomes incorporated into her husband's family; and as, if the power of testacy be freely given, it can never act against the wishes of the wife, we think that the 19th section of the bill should be confined to cases of desertion and judicial separation, and should not take effect unless so declared in the order of the Court.

The bill would, in our opinion, be much improved by leaving out all except sections 1, 10, 11, 13, 17, 19, 22, 23, 24, and 25, and restricting the operation of section 19 as above mentioned.

THE IRISH LAND BILL.

When we contemplate the Merchant Shipping Bill of this session, with its 800 clauses, we can hardly be too thankful that the bill of the session, dealing with a most difficult subject, is comprised in some 1½ lb. of printed matter, numbering but sixty-eight clauses and a schedule. The Irish Land Bill is now fairly launched, and it is encouraging to see it approached on all sides with a determination to merge party differences in the one aim of doing all that can be done to remedy the evil at which the measure strikes. The Fenian press, and other professional discontents, may be expected to rail; it is their business to be discontented, and they object to express any approval of anything; much as a popular comic actor once objected to make a speech on a public occasion, upon the ground that his livelihood would be in danger if he were suspected of a capacity for talking reasonably.

A stranger to the history of Ireland might ask why Ireland needs a land-law differing from that which works satisfactorily enough in England. Undoubtedly the supporters of this, or any kindred measure, have to show cause against that objection, and, unfortunately, the cause is only too easily shown. It is not necessary to go into historical details, or to discuss how an antagonism between owners and occupiers has been fostered by the course which acquisition of Irish land has followed, from the days of the Adventurers who obtained Crown grants centuries ago, to the modern time of purchasers under the Encumbered Estates Acts. Doubtless the discontent of Irish tenantry is aroused to a considerable extent not only by the fact that strange landlords will not give them security of tenure, but by the fact, for which the murmurers are entitled to less sympathy, that the stranger landlords do expect them to pay their rent punctually. Sir Jonah Barrington, in his most entertaining Memoirs, has shown the manner in which, under the old regime, all parties muddled on together; the landlords taking the rent from their hangers-on when they could get it, but never dreaming of evicting when they could not—a style of jovial muddle which reads more pleasantly in an Irish novel than as a page in the real history of Ireland. It is needless, however, to discuss these questions; it is enough to recognise the facts that unless tenants enjoy practically some meed of stability of tenure, the land will inevitably be under-farmed and unimproved, and that in Ireland stability of tenure is the exception. In England, with the same law of contract, the tenants either get leases or else the landlords execute the improvements. Even an English yearly tenancy is practically a far more stable tenancy than one in Ireland. The mutual jealousy of owner and occupier in Ireland naturally augments by action and reaction. A disturbing force is necessary to remedy all this, and in settling its nature and application it is wholly unnecessary to speculate as to who, if anyone, is to blame for the evil as it exists.

So far as legislation has meddled with the subject, there has not been anything nearer the mark than the statutes 19 & 20 Vict. c. 65 and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 154. The former merely relates to garden grounds of not more than half an acre and the emblements corresponding, and the latter merely provides a machinery for securing to yearly and other tenants the value of improvements made with the landlord's consent.

As to the remedy to be applied, the insuperable objections to what has been spoken of as fixity, or perpetuity of tenure, were excellently put by Mr. Gladstone in his explanatory speech on the 15th. Even if any rational argument could be assigned for such a proposal, it is obvious that the change would be no more permanent in its effect than a distribution of the entire wealth of a country among its entire population. But such a change would, as Mr. Gladstone pointed out, by reducing the landlord to the position of a mere rent-charger on his own land, extinguish all hope of that good understanding between landlord and tenant which exists in England, and deprive the country of that conscientious acceptance by landlords of a responsibility for public duties which is "a just relic and a true descendant of the feudal system;" it would also virtually proscribe the class who desire to rent but not to own. That the taxpayers of England and Scotland could hardly be expected to pay the Irish landlord's compensation, is the least important consideration.

The main principle of the present measure is the introduction, where no custom exists, of a relation as between owner and occupier, similar to that known as the Ulster tenant right custom. Where the Ulster custom is in force an evicted or retiring tenant receives from his landlord compensation both for improvements (including as well unexhausted manures and tillages as permanent improvements like buildings or reclamation) and the loss sustained through quitting—i.e., goodwill. Where this custom exists, the bill, by section 1, formally legalises it, and then leaves it alone. Section 2 provides that where a custom other than the Ulster custom prevails, the tenant shall be entitled to such compensation as the particular usage allows. Section 3 provides for the mass of holdings which are not protected by any custom. As to all holdings not subject to the Ulster custom, the bill puts compensation for improvements and compensation for goodwill on separate footings. The tenant gets the latter only where "disturbed by the act of the landlord," and not where evicted for non-payment of rent, and the new right differs from the Ulster custom in this respect, that a voluntarily retiring tenant gets nothing for goodwill,* but even the tenant who is evicted for non-payment of rent gets his improvement compensation, subject to proper deductions. As to the mass of unproected holdings coming under section 3, a scale is provided, under which, for all compensation other than for permanent improvements, the tenant of a holding under £10 yearly rent may be awarded seven years' rent or under, between £10 and £50, five years' rent or under, between £50 and £100, three years' rent or under, and over £100 two years' rent or under. The claim for permanent improvement is extra to this. Both when compensation is claimed under some custom outside Ulster and where claimed purely under the bill, allowance is to be made for arrears of rent, or injury to the land accrued through non-observance of an express or implied contract with the landlord; and a tenant with a thirty-one years' lease made after the Act can claim nothing for goodwill.

The improvements for which a tenant is to claim are "improvements adding to the lettable values of the land;" and made by "the tenant or his predecessors in title," that is, the tenant can only claim for improvements executed by a preceding tenant, when "money or money's worth" was paid to that tenant by his successor, and soon in continuance up to and including the incoming of the claimant. But a tenant who after the Act sublets without his landlord's consent (except for labourers' gardens), may claim no compensation whatever for goodwill.*

A tenant is not allowed to contract himself out of the Act,—except that, where his holding is between £50 and £100 yearly value, he may contract himself out of all rights, except for tillage or manure, by accepting a twenty-one years' lease, to be approved by the new tribunal; and that where his holding is over £100 yearly value, he may contract without restriction. The ratio of this scale is the fact that in large holdings the practice as between owner and occupier is found to be more akin to that in England. And the tenant cannot, of course, claim for improvements which the landlord has agreed to execute, unless there be unreasonable delay on the landlord's part.

Then the Bill also endeavours to facilitate purchases of land by tenants, by authorising the Irish Commissioners of Public Works, where a landlord consents to sell, to advance three-fourths of the valuation price, repayable by a twenty-two years' annuity, charged as Government drainage advances are now charged in England. The commissioners may also make advances to landlords, either for improvements or for compensation payable under the Act to tenants.

Lastly the bill provides a machinery for carrying out all this. It appoints a tribunal which is to assess everything and determine everything, and by means of a clause which Mr. Gladstone called the "equity clause," it invests this tribunal with the widest possible discretion in determining everything under the Act. Thus there is an absolute discretion to say whether or not a particular eviction for non-payment of rent is or is not to be deemed a "disturbance of the tenant by the landlord." The Court may consider whether the rent payable is fixed too high or too low, and may take the difference, if any, into account. It has an absolute discretion to decide what is and what is not an "improvement, adding to the lettable value of the land"—and what is and what is not a reasonable time for the landlord to perform any contract on his part. It is necessary to the success of the scheme that the machinery should work cheaply, which could only be effected by conferring a wide discretionary power like this.

The tribunal endowed with this discretion consists, in the choice of the parties, either of the Civil

* As the bill stands, a retiring tenant, or one evicted for non-payment of rent, is entitled to claim for unexhausted tillages or manures.

* We have here given a short analysis of the substance of several sections. In the arrangement of sections all claim whatever is taken from the rent-defaulter and sub-letter, by sub-clauses to sections 2 and 3, and section 4 afterwards restores to them a claim for improvements. Quære, however, whether these defaulters should be entitled to claim for anything but permanent improvements?

Bill out of the district, or the assessor sitting as an Arbitration Court. The decision of the latter is final, but the decision of the former may be reviewed by the common law judges, who, if they please, may reserve points for a "Court for Land Cases Reserved."

Finally, the bill throws on the landlord the burden of proving that improvements were not made by the tenant (it is silent as to the proof that an alleged improvement is a real one, the proof of that remains consequently with the party alleging it). The bill also, besides imposing a stamp duty of 2s. 6d. on notices to quit, requires that each notice shall be for twelve months, reckoned from the last gale day of the current year.

Omitting, of course, a quantity of details, we have now gone through the main features of the bill. We should, perhaps, apologise for thus recapitulating what, in popular phrase, is in everybody's mouth. Our aim has been to assist those of our readers who have not leisure or inclination to study closely the Bill itself.

The scheme is conceived, not, as a sop to Cerberus, conceding a percentage on a clamorous demand, but as an honest endeavour to suggest the true remedy for an admitted evil. It seems to us that its framers have hit the only means of untying the knot, and that the plan in its main characteristics is admirable. No doubt, in its details, the bill will require much amendment. It is, of course, impossible for us here to indicate every point upon which we think that it should be altered, but we shall in future issues draw attention to various details. We will at present only trouble the reader with a very few more observations.

It appears that in various cases Ulster landlords have, as it were, enfranchised their land by purchasing the custom of the tenant, and when that has been done, the land by the second half of section 1 ceases to be subject to the Ulster custom. Consequently under section 3 the tenant who has just sold his right to compensation can claim it afresh under section 4 as "a tenant not entitled to compensation under sections 1 and 2 . . . and not entitled . . . under section 3 of this Act." Is it intended that this shall be so? A case of hardship somewhat similar to that of these landlords, who have just purchased the Ulster custom, will be that of those landlords who have purchased of the Landed Estates Court, and who will naturally complain loudly if to the purchase-money they have just paid should be added a liability to pay over again for a portion of that they saw on the ground when they purchased. It may be that in order to carry into effect so great a remedy, a partial hardship, not to say injustice, is necessary. It must however, be reduced to a minimum. We must confess that the point on which we have most misgivings is as to the costs of the proceedings before the land tribunal between landlord and tenant; for the Irish, like the Welsh, are prone to rush into litigation, though less perseveringly litigious. Much, very much indeed, will depend on the Court. It must manage to command full confidence, and it must manage somehow or other to supply "substantial justice" quick, cheap, and good. Sooth to say, the Irish lawyers make better advocates than judges. They are beset even when on the bench by a national tendency to burst away into brilliant but irrelevant oratory. Still the national shrewdness may pilot the way to the substantial justice aforesaid and prove a hundred times more valuable than the closest reasoning on a point of law. Much also must depend upon the spirit in which the suitors and their agents approach these questions as to compensation and "good will" (and as the shoemaker turned farmer observed in Hood's story, "candour compels to state a very small quantity of the last named article on hand up to the present time"). We believe that in its principle the present bill has hit, if anything can hit, the remedy. There remains the task of settling its details. If this be successfully accomplished a happier time may come, when, the change having done its work, it may be found possible once more to place English and Irish land under the same law of contract.

CLERGY IN PARLIAMENT.

Mr. Hibbert, the member for Oldham, has introduced a bill to relieve clergymen of the Church of England from the incapacity of sitting in Parliament under which they at present labour; and undoubtedly, as matters now stand, there is an appearance of hardship which justifies an attempt at legislation. The measure proposed, moreover, must not be supposed to attack what many regard as the sacred principle of indelibility of orders. A clerical M.P. would be a clergyman still, although it might be expedient to restrain him for parochial duty as long as he chose to mingle in political conflict. The question of the political disabilities of the clergy is quite distinct from the question of whether or not their religious status ought to be temporary or perpetual. We do not at present propose to discuss the expediency of the alteration in the law advocated by Mr. Hibbert; but our readers will be better able to form a sound judgment on his bill if we recall to their recollection the historical incidents of the present law of exclusion.

The statute which at present disqualifies the clergy is the 41 Geo. 3, c. 63, which is entitled "An Act to remove doubts respecting the eligibility of persons in holy orders to sit in the House of Commons," and professes to be a "declaratory" Act. By section 1 it enacts that "no person having been ordained to the office of priest or deacon, or being a minister of the church of Scotland, is or shall be capable of being elected to serve in Parliament as a member of the House of Commons." The second section declares and enacts that the election of such a person shall be void; and that if, after election, a Member of Parliament should be ordained priest or deacon, or become a minister of the Church of Scotland, he shall thereby vacate his seat, and a penalty is imposed upon sitting or voting in either case. Section 3 provides that penalties must be sued for within twelve months of their being incurred; and the last section (section 4) makes proof of the celebration of divine service according to the rites of the Church of England or the Church of Scotland, in any church or chapel consecrated or set apart for public worship, prima facie evidence of the fact of the celebrant being a priest, deacon, or minister, within the meaning of the Act.

The reason why this statute was passed was the circumstance that the celebrated Horne Tooke, who was in priest's orders, had previously to the meeting of Parliament in 1801 accepted from Lord Camelford a seat for the nomination borough of Old Sarum. Upon his appearing and taking the oaths, Earl Temple called attention to the fact that he was "in priest's orders, and had been inducted into a living;" and gave notice that if no petition were presented against the return he should move that "the return for Old Sarum be taken into consideration." There can be little doubt that Tooke's turbulent character and, as they were then considered, almost revolutionary opinions on the subject of Parliamentary reform were the real causes of the return being questioned. At the time of his election he was not engaged in any parochial duty, so that no practical inconvenience would have followed from allowing him to take his seat sub silentio. As far back as 1773 he had formally resigned his living and announced his absolute abandonment of his clerical character. But he was destined to find that such an announcement did not avail to open to him either a legal or a Parliamentary career. In 1777 he suffered his first severe disappointment in the refusal of the Inner Temple to admit him to the bar on account of his being in orders. We need scarcely add that that learned society would not for that reason refuse a candidate for admission now. The bar at present counts among its members several clergymen of the Church of England, of whom one at least is a member of the Inner Temple.

Tooke, baffled in his hopes of becoming a barrister, occupied himself almost exclusively with politics, and determined, if he could, to get into Parliament. In 1790 he stood against Fox and Lord Hood for Westminster, but was defeated. He again became a candidate in 1796 but with no better success, although his popularity with a Radical constituency must have been increased by his having been two years before put upon his trial for high treason in advocating reforms which the Solicitor-General (Mitford) in opening the prosecution averred were nothing but "rank rebellion" (Howell's State Trials, vol. 25, p. 62). After a protracted inquiry he was acquitted, and left the court with a characteristic word of advice to the Attorney-General (Scott) to be more cautious for the future. But even this audacity and success did not win over the Westminster electors, and for five years longer Tooke remained without a seat. Eventually advanced reformer as he was, he accepted, as we have seen, Lord Camelford's nomination to Old Sarum.

The petition which Lord Temple seemed to think possible was not presented for the best of reasons, that there was literally nobody to present it, and accordingly he brought on his motion on Friday, the 6th March. Evidence was heard on the 10th to prove that Tooke was really a priest, the House declining to act upon his own admission, and a committee to search for precedents was appointed. The report was, we are told by Mr. May, obscure and inconclusive, and the House declined to declare Tooke ineligible. The fact was that the precedents were found to be contradictory. Thus, in 1785 a petition was presented complaining of the election of Edward Rushworth, clerk, for Newport, "he being a clerk in holy orders and incapable to be elected to serve in Parliament," and was referred to a committee who found that "Edward Rushworth, Esq., was duly elected." Rushworth appears, from the report of the case in 2 Luters, 269, to have been a deacon only; and it was argued that, even assuming a priest to be eligible, it did not follow that a deacon was. The reason of the exclusion of the clergy given by Coke and Blackstone—the possibility of being elected members of convocation—was certainly inapplicable, it was said, to mere deacons, who did not and could not sit there. (See Co. 4 Inst. 47.)

The Committee gave no reasons for their decision. It may very possibly therefore have turned on the supposed difference between a deacon and priest, which afforded them some justification for departing from the precedents in the cases of Nowell (1553), Robson (1620), and Craddock (1661). The language of the reports in these three cases is worth notice. In the first the committee give Coke and Blackstone's reason for their decision, reporting that Nowell being a prebendary of Westminster, and thereby having a voice in the Convocation house, cannot be a member of this house. In the second the resolution was as follows; "that he (Robson) ought not to be accepted to serve as a member of this house, by reason that he is a minister, and so hath or may have a voice in the convocation," still adopting the view that membership, actual or possible, of convocation is the proper test. In Craddock's case the report is simply that it appeared to the Committee that he was in "holy orders," and therefore ineligible—a general sort of phraseology which might include all ordained persons, without regard to their privilege of being represented or sitting in convocation. And, in truth, the "convocation" argument is not a good one, for as Mr. Justice Christian points out in his edition of Blackstone (vol. i. p. 175), the same reasoning would apply to the exclusion of bishops from the House of Lords. There are also some instances in early times of clergy in priests' orders sitting in the Commons, although then they were permitted to tax themselves in Convocation. The real ground of their not having, as a rule, ever been elected was, in the opinion of the learned editor, "owing solely to the tenure of their glebe lands, viz., frankalmoin, which exempted them from attendance on the courts of the king, lords, and sheriffs; and even if they held other lands, 'holy orders' exempted them by the common law from secular services and temporal offices, and this was confirmed by Magna Charta and the statute of Marlbridge." But this was an exemption, and not an exclusion. What are now precious privileges were once, it must be recollected, regarded as burdensome duties, and clergy not unnaturally availed themselves of their exemption, until disuser became regarded as proof of incapacity. The conclusion to which Mr. Justice Christian arrives is that there is no rule of common law which excludes either priests or deacons. The committee in the Newport case would seem, therefore, to have properly neglected the precedents adduced in support of the contrary view, and the House to have been right in declining to resolve that Tooke was ineligible. But the Ministry of the day were determined to get rid of him as soon as they could, and with that object in May, 1801, the statute (41 Geo. 3, c. 63) was passed. It was not retrospective, and Tooke retained his seat until the next dissolution. Whether it really was declaratory or not remains a vexed question; but we think it may be safely said that the better opinion is that it was not. Mr. Hibbert's bill should accordingly be regarded as re-establishing old law than as introducing new.

It may be well to point out that if the English clergy are to be relieved from disability, the Romish clergy may, upon the popular principles of "equality" claim to be relieved also. The 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, s. 9, excludes the Roman Catholic clergy from the general benefits of Catholic emancipation. Would not the repeal of the 41 Geo. 3, c. 63, entail that of the 9th section of 10 Geo. 4, c. 7? If such a liberty of candidature is permitted we may soon see some of the more popular Irish priests at Westminster. And we are far from saying that such a result ought to be deprecated. It may be better that an Irish elector should vote, if he pleases, for his priest rather than at his priests bidding for some obedient nominee of the clerical party. In the approaching debates upon Irish education an educated and intelligent Irish ecclesiastic might be a valuable acquisition to the House of Commons.

RECENT DECISIONS.

COMMON LAW.

PLEADING—NEW ASSIGNMENT—TRESPASS TO LAND.

Huddart v. Rigby, Ex. Ch., 18 W. R. 213.

The system of common law pleading has been so much simplified by the three Common Law Procedure Acts that questions of mere pleading are now seldom argued before the courts in banc. In Huddart v. Rigby, however, a question of this sort came before the Exchequer Chamber, and the decision is of considerable importance with respect to the necessity of new assigning in actions for trespass to land. The declaration was in the ordinary form, that the defendant broke and entered the plaintiff's close, and broke down and damaged gates, fences, &c. The pleas were not guilty, and a justification on the ground that there was a footpath across the land, and that the alleged trespasses were committed in order to use the path. Issue was joined on these pleas, but the plaintiff did not new assign. At the trial the plaintiff admitted the right of way alleged in the plea, but offered to prove that the defendant had trespassed beyond the footpath, that there were no gates, &c., on the path, and that the defendant had destroyed the gates, &c., on another part of the land. The evidence was rejected, and a verdict was entered for the defendant.

The ordinary course for a plaintiff in a case like this is not only to join issue on the pleas, but also to new assign—that is, to reply that he sues not only for the trespasses justified by the defendant's plea, but also for others committed at other times and occasions, and on other parts of the land. Such pleading would have precisely met the difficulty in this case, but the question was whether, in the absence of a new assignment, the evidence tendered by the plaintiff ought to have been received.

The substantial point was whether a declaration like the one in this case is to be taken as alleging only one trespass, or two distinct and substantive trespasses. If it is to be construed as alleging only one trespass it was pretty clear that the plaintiff's contention was wrong, because the defendant's plea answered one trespass by setting up a right of way, and the plaintiff admitted the existence of the right of way. By joining issue the plaintiff had admitted that the trespass so justified was the trespass complained of, and without a new assignment he could not at the trial say that he was really suing for some other trespass not touched by the plea. If, however, the declaration alleged two substantive trespasses a different question would arise. At the trial the plaintiff would be entitled to prove both or either of the trespasses. Although the plea in form covered both trespasses, yet the evidence might support the plea only as to one, and if so evidence for that purpose ought to have been admitted.

The common form of a declaration for trespass to land generally contains, after the allegation of the breaking and entering, a statement of acts by the defendant which, if they stood alone, would amount to substantive trespasses, as, in this case, the breaking of gates, &c. The question therefore was, whether such statements in a declaration of trespass are to be taken as allegations of substantive trespasses, and if so the declaration would contain two distinct causes of action; or whether such acts are to be looked on as mere averments of damage consequent on the one trespass in breaking and entering the plaintiff's close. It was held "that the breaking down of the gates and fences was mere aggravation," and that there was therefore but one cause of action alleged in the declaration, the breaking and entering which was answered by the plea, and as the facts stated in the plea were admitted, the defendant was entitled to a verdict.

This case will in future be a most useful authority in deciding where it is necessary to new assign in actions of trespass. Such questions are not at present of as much importance as they used to be, but even now the pleadings in an action frequently affect very seriously the right to costs, and sometimes, as in this case, even the final result of the action.

REVIEWS.

Chronological Table and Index to the Statutes to the End of the Session of 1869. By AUTHORITY. London: Printed by George William Eyre and William Spottiswoode, Printers to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty. 1870.

The nature of this work will be best explained by the following extract from the preface:—

"This volume contains two works which, though separate, are arranged for combined use.

"The first is a table of all the statutes, arranged in order of date.

"The second is an index to enactments in force.

"The chronological table is framed with these objects:—

"(1.) To show what Acts are not in force, and how the same have ceased to be in force (by express repeal or otherwise):

"(2.) With respect to Acts wholly or partly in force to give the respective heads in the index under which the enactments in force (with other enactments on the same subject) will be found:

"(3.) With respect to Acts partly in force to give any express partial repeals thereof (but not to give other operations on Acts wholly or partly in force,—as amendments, extensions, or perpetuations,—these being traceable by the index).

"The index is framed with the object of indicating generally the subject-matter of enactments in force, not of giving a detailed analysis of each Act.

"It is intended not to furnish an exhaustive summary of the statute law under each head, but to serve as a guide to a person desiring to find out the enactments bearing on a given subject.

"For example, the entries under the head Forgery are not a summary of all Acts relating to forgery, and a person wanting to know what are the Acts relating to forgery of the seal of a particular court, or of a particular species of document, must look to the head under which that court or species of document is indexed, not to the head Forgery. So again in the case of Justices of the Peace, the enactments relative to their duties will be found distributed under the heads relating to particular subjects, and not collected under the general head of Justice of the Peace."

The chronological table is printed in triple column, the first column giving the year, statute and chapter, the second the subject-matter, and the third stating how the Act has been repealed or otherwise determined wholly or in part. This table extends from 20 Hen. 3, to the end of last session, and this alone would be an extremely useful publication.

The index is in four parts, one embracing Acts which extend only to England, and the other three the Irish, Scotch and Colonial Acts respectively. English Acts which also extend to Ireland, Scotland or the Colonies, are distinguished by the letter I., S. or C. as the case may be. In supplying these latter references the framers have in one or two instances had to assign a conjectural limit to the Act. Thus, under the head of Reversion, the Sales of Reversions Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 4), is indexed as I. & S., the framers not venturing to pronounce upon the question ex cathedra. Remembering the discussion which took place shortly after the passing of the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 144 (enabling assignees of life policies to sue in their own names) as to whether or not the Act extended to Scotland, we turned to the heading Insurance—Life with some curiosity to see how the framers treated the question, and found that they had assumed the Act as extending to Scotland, a conclusion to which we ourselves inclined (12 S. J. 356); the question, however, was certainly a doubtful one.

The true test of the method upon which an index has been compiled, and the manner in which that method has been carried into execution, is the employment of the index in practice. If on use of the index, the respective subject matters appear to be arranged in the places where one would reasonably expect to find them, the index may be pronounced good. It must necessarily be hard to make an index like the present, good, according to such a definition, and yet keep it manageable in point of size. If we were to venture a suggestion, we should be inclined to say that the principal headings—such as Executor, and so forth—might have advantageously had a rather wider scope assigned to them, so as to diminish cross-reference. But, without further practice in handling the digest, we are not prepared to assert this. We may at least pronounce that the digest is very fairly manageable, and are not sure that it could have been made more than that. Anyone searching for some enactment of which he has some previous notion will be able to find it with tolerable readiness; if his search is purely speculative, the cross-references are, we think, sufficiently exhaustive for the searcher's protection. And it must be remembered that no index could be constructed which should enable persons unlearned in the law to refer to every enactment now in force as easily as they can take down a volume from a shelf. The table and index now issued by her Majesty's Government will be found a boon, and practice will render it easier to handle.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

Feb. 24.—Re Arnold.

Petition under 126th section Bankruptcy Act, 1869—Appointment of receiver—Injunction—Form of affidavit.

Mr. J. Seymour Salaman, solicitor, applied, pursuant to notices of motion, to restrain certain creditors from proceeding with their actions and executions against the debtor.

It appeared that the debtor had filed a petition for composition with creditors under the 126th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. A receiver had been appointed by the Court, and possession had been taken of the property. In support of the application (which was made on behalf of the debtor) it was contended that although the appointment of a receiver sufficiently protected the property, it afforded no protection to the debtor, who might be summoned under the Debtors Act at the very moment that he was preparing his accounts for presentation at the first meeting of creditors.

Upon the affidavit in support of the application being read, the Chief Judge pointed out a defect—the amounts due upon the judgments or claimed in the actions not being stated,—and his Lordship said it would be convenient that these particulars should be set out.

Some of the plaintiffs in the actions appeared, but no objection being made,

The Chief Judge granted orders restraining further proceedings.

In re Burnett.

Rule 260—Application to restrain proceedings—Receiver.

This was an application to restrain a creditor from proceeding on a debtor's summons which had been issued with a view to bankruptcy. A petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition had been filed on the 8th inst., and the Court had appointed a receiver. The ground of the application was that bankruptcy would be prejudicial to the recovery of the estate, which consisted of a number of small debts which the debtor only could collect. The debtor alleged that he owed a sum of £1,188, of which the creditor issuing the summons swore that £549 was due to him.

Mr. W. Haigh, jun. (solicitor), supported the application.

Reed, for the creditor, opposed it, and, referring to division 2 of the 125th section, and the 6th, 7th, and 8th divisions of the 16th section, contended that, in order to carry a valid resolution, three-fourths of the creditors must assent to it. In this case the respondent was, to the knowledge of the debtor, antagonistic to any arrangement, and, as it was impossible to obtain the necessary majority without his aid, it was submitted that the filing the petition was, under the circumstances, a mere waste of funds, and that the proceedings in bankruptcy ought to continue.

The Chief Judge said that as he understood the statute the debtor had a right to file a petition, and at the first meeting the creditors had the right to decide what should be done. His Lordship thought the proceedings on the summons should be stayed until after the day appointed for the first meeting, and, if the meeting failed, the creditors had power to file a petition for adjudication which would be irresistible under the circumstances. It became, therefore, a question of a few days only, and how could he deprive the debtor and the creditors who were assenting, if there were such, of the statutory power which was conferred upon them? Everything would be done to protect the property in the meantime. The receiver was the receiver not only of the debts but of the whole of the property of the debtor, and no part of his estate could be dissipated or perverted in the interval.

Solicitor for the creditor, Bennett.

Re Burnett.

Duties of receiver.

This was an application of a similar nature, and the same creditor opposed.

Mr. W. Haigh, jun. (solicitor) for the application.

Reed, for the creditors.

The Chief Judge ordered a stay of proceedings until after the first meeting, intimating that the receiver was an officer of the court, and amenable to the Court. He was bound to bring in his accounts, and to pay over any balance that might be due from him. His Lordship said the protection thus afforded was effectual. He hoped it would be so, and it was his intention that it should be effectual.

Solicitor for the creditor, Bennett.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. JOSEPH TROUNSELL GILBERT, barrister-at-law, has been gazetted as Attorney-General of the colony of British Guiana, in succession to the Hon. John Lucie Smith, C.M.G., who was recently appointed Chief Justice of Jamaica. Mr. Gilbert was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in November, 1842, and was Solicitor-General of British Guiana from 1856 to 1863, when he resigned, but continued to practise at the colonial bar.

Mr. JULIAN E. SALOMONS, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Solicitor-General of the colony of New South Wales. Mr. Salomons was called to the bar at Gray's-inn in January, 1861, and has latterly practised at the Sydney bar.

Mr. J. COKE FOWLER, stipendiary magistrate of Merthyr and Aberdare, has been appointed Deputy Chairman of the Glamorganshire Quarter Sessions. Mr. Fowler was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1840.

Mr. AUGUSTUS KEPPEL STEPHENSON, Assistant Solicitor of the Treasury, has been appointed temporarily to perform the duties of Registrar of Friendly Societies (which office was rendered vacant by the death of Mr. J. Tidd Pratt), pending the decision of Parliament upon the measure which has been introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer affecting the office. Mr. Stephenson was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in January, 1852, and was formerly a member of the Norfolk Circuit; he was Recorder of Bedford previous to being appointed Assistant Solicitor to the Treasury, in succession to Mr. J. Greenwood, Q.C., who became Solicitor on the death of Mr. H. R. Reynolds.

Mr. JOHN WILLIAM SANGSTER, solicitor, of Leeds, has been appointed Registrar of the Pontefract County Court, in the place of Mr. Henry John Coleman, resigned. Mr. Sangster was certificated in Hilary Term, 1857, and is a member of the legal firm of Marshall & Sangster, of Leeds. He is also a member of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

Mr. JOSEPH THOMAS COLLIN, solicitor, of Saffron Walden, Essex, has been appointed Under-sheriff for the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon during the present year; but the business of the shrievalty will be transacted at the office of Messrs. Wilkinson, Butler, & Wilkinson, of St. Neots, Huntingdonshire, the Deputy Under-sheriffs. Mr. Collin was certificated in Easter Term, 1831, and is registrar of the county court, clerk to the magistrates, and clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes for Saffron Walden and Linton.

Mr. ROBERT BRISTOW BERRIDGE, solicitor, of Leicester, has been appointed Under-sheriff of the county for the current year. Mr. Berridge, who was certificated in Easter Term, 1853, is the senior partner in the local firm of Berridge & Morris.

Mr. MONTAGUE GROVER, solicitor, of Cardiff, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Glamorganshire for the present year. Mr. Grover, who holds the office of Town Clerk of Cardiff, was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1837, and is the senior partner in the local firm of Grover & Davis.

Mr. FREDERICK SCUDAMORE, solicitor, of Maidstone, has been appointed Under-sheriff of the county of Kent, for the present year. Mr. Scudamore was certificated in Easter Term, 1840, and is a member of the local firm of Scudamore & Brennan; he is also registrar of the Maidstone County Court, and Clerk of the Peace for that district.

Mr. WILLIAM SLOCOMBE, solicitor, of Reading, has been nominated by Mr. William Weedon, the newly-appointed Coroner for the Eastern Division of the county of Berks, to be his Deputy Coroner, and the appointment has been duly confirmed by the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. MATTHEW ALEXANDER FITTER, solicitor, of 5, Bennett's-hill, Birmingham, has been appointed a Commissioner for taking affidavits in the Courts of Common Pleas and Chancery of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

Mr. ROWLAND TAYLOR, solicitor, of Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

A HAPPY QUOTATION.—In a recent action in the Supreme Court, brought by a purchaser against the vendors, to recover damages for the non-fulfilment of an executory contract of sale, the defendants claimed an exemption from liability, on the ground that the subject of sale, a quantity of cotton, had been accidentally destroyed by fire, which, their counsel insisted, was an "act of God," rendering performance impossible. To this the plaintiff's counsel replied: "There seems to be an inclination, sometimes, among jurists, to attribute to the Almighty what cannot be distinctly charged upon any one else. It would be better for them to follow the advice which Horace gives to dramatic authors, not to introduce a God upon the stage, except in a crisis worthy of such an awful intervention. Nec deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus Inciderit."—Albany Law Journal.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PRACTICE OF THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—The next two questions of the Judicature Commissioners relate to a matter of very grave importance, and I am extremely anxious to draw especial attention to the details on the subject which I have collected in this letter. They ask:—"20. Ought the process of the court to be served exclusively by the officers of the court, or by the suitors, or their attorneys, or persons employed by them? 21. Have the provisions of the County Court Amendment Act, 1867, s. 2, as to service by the parties, operated beneficially or otherwise?"

To understand these questions properly it must be borne in mind that, prior to the year 1867, the county court process was exclusively served by the bailiffs of the courts, and—subject to two exceptions—judgment by default, as understood in the superior courts, was not recognised. One of the exceptions in question was introduced into the Act of 1856, and in substance it provides, that in any action for a debt exceeding £20 the plaintiff may issue a summons in a peculiar form, requiring the defendant to give notice of intention to defend, on pain of judgment by default. This summons must be personally served on the defendant, but, like other summonses, it is entrusted to the bailiff for service (19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 28, 29). The other exception relates to bills of exchange for sums varying from £10 to £50, actions on which may be followed up by judgments by default, provided the summonses have been personally served by the bailiff, and no leave to defend has been given (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67, and Orders in Council, Jan. 30, 1856, and July 27, 1863). In 1867 the concurrent jurisdiction of the superior courts, where the debtor lived more than twenty miles from the creditor, was, for all practical purposes, taken away in actions of contract for sums not exceeding £20, and this salutary change in the law was thought to afford a good opportunity for extending the very limited powers which the County Courts had hitherto exercised in granting judgments by default. Such an extension was considered particularly necessary with respect to transactions between wholesale and retail dealers, and section 2 of the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, was drawn with the view of carrying out the alteration proposed. Instead, however, of simply applying the judgment-by-default clause of the Act of 1856 to all actions brought for the price of goods which had been sold to defendants "to be dealt with in the way of trade," a special provision was framed to the effect that the summons which, under the new law, would justify the entering up of judgment by default, should be personally served on defendant by the bailiff, "or, at the option of the plaintiff, by the plaintiff, his attorney, or by some clerk or servant in the permanent employ of the plaintiff or his attorney."

Now, had the change in the law stopped here I should have strongly objected to it on two grounds. First, because I think that any system of judgment by default, when the debt is less than £5, is liable to serious abuse, from the want of education which too generally prevails among persons who submit to be sued for very small amounts, and who would not be likely to notice the distinction between a judgment-by-default summons and an ordinary summons; and next, because the county courts, at a very large expense, keep up a machinery for serving process which is amply sufficient, and admirably adapted, for that purpose. It is absurd, therefore, to entrust to private persons a duty which can be better performed by efficient officers, and it is obviously unwise to allow plaintiffs to serve process on defendants, for such a practice not only enables an overbearing creditor to insult his debtor grossly, but it sorely tempts a choleric defendant to commit a breach of the peace. Again, the plaintiff's clerk or servant should certainly not be permitted to serve the summons; for as the Court has no means of knowing what reliance should be placed on his testimony, it ought not to be called on to sign judgment on his mere affidavit of service; and the employment of an attorney for such a purpose is simply an idle contrivance for creating needless costs, whoever has to pay for them. If it be urged that, as a creditor is generally acquainted with his debtor's appearance and habits and haunts, he can find him and identify him more readily than a stranger can; the short answer is, that he is always at liberty to make an appointment with the officer, and to accompany him when he is going to serve the process. His presence may, in this manner, be occasionally of use, while the presence of the officer will have the desirable effect of checking any unseemly altercation between the parties.

But, after all, the objections to the new system of judgment by default rest principally on what I am now going to mention. I allude to the large and unjustifiable increase in the costs which has resulted from the change. How or why the costs have increased, I will not stop to inquire, but certainly for some inscrutable reason those who stand behind the Lord Chancellor and the Treasury have thought fit to advise, that all parties concerned in working out section 2 of the Act—plaintiffs, attorneys, registrars and bailiffs—should each and all derive some substantial benefit from it, the unfortunate defendants being required to bear the whole additional expense. Whenever a claim under section 2 exceeds 40s., the following fees, in addition to the ten per cent. payable on an admitted debt, may be demanded:—By the plaintiff and his attorney, for affidavit of debt, 5s.; for service of summons, 5s.; for mileage beyond two miles, from 6d. to 4s.; say, on an average, 1s.; for affidavit of service, &c., 6s. 8d. By the registrar for filing affidavit of debt, 1s.; for entering up judgment, 4s. By high bailiff, where the service is left to him, for service and affidavit, 2s.

To comprehend thoroughly the effect of these fees, let us suppose that a poor retail dealer owes his creditor a sum of £3. If sued under the old law he admits the claim, and judgment is given against him for £3 7s. Under the new law if the process be served by the plaintiff or his attorney, and the defendant live four miles off, judgment will be entered up for £4 8s. 8d., and if the bailiff serve the summons, the judgment will be for £3 19s. In other words, the fees in the one case, instead of being merely ten per cent., will be little short of fifty per cent., while in the other case they will amount to thirty per cent.

It is not, however, by taking an isolated case that the operation of these atrocious taxes can be fully realised. I will therefore further illustrate the matter by pointing out what, in the aggregate, has been their effect in a single court in the course of a single year. For this purpose I will select a metropolitan court, where the plaints entered in 1869 did not exceed 15,000, and where I know on the best authority, that nearly 1,000 summonses were issued under the 2nd section, and that more than 270 of these were served by the parties. I am not informed as to how many judgments by default were actually entered up, but I presume I am safe in fixing their number at about one fourth of the whole, or, say, 250. Taking, then, these figures, and referring to the fees as stated above, any one who likes to go through the calculation will find, that, during the year, the plaintiffs must have realised for their costs about £200, the registrar about £100, and the high bailiff from £60 to £70, making a total of about £360, which, in addition to the regular fees, must have been charged to the wretched defendants. I have reason to believe that in many of the courts the summonses issued under section 2 are not nearly so numerous at present as they are in the court in question, but probably this variance arises from the fact that the Rules and Orders are better understood in some courts than in others, and that registrars and bailiffs are not uniformly alive to their own interest. Still, should these taxes unhappily remain in force, I feel very sure that in the course of a short time the figures I have just given will become a fair sample of what may be found in any county court, and then, if we remember that 15,000 plaints are about one-sixty-fifth part of the whole number yearly issued, it follows as a simple arithmetical calculation that, so soon as a knowledge of the law has become generally diffused, the poorer class of tradesmen will be annually mulcted in extra costs to the extent of at least £23,000. Wincing under the operation of such taxes as these, well may they seek to derive comfort in exclaiming, "Woe unto you, ye lawyers, for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne."

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

STAMPS ON BUILDING LEASES.

Sir,—It appears to me that the question whether a covenant to build, repair, or improve is or is not a "further or other valuable consideration" is not a question of law, but of fact to be arrived at, not by considering what may or may not become the value of the property during the continuance or at the expiration of the lease, but what is the market value of the lessor's interest in the property upon the lease being granted.

If a person demises a house in a bad state of repair for nine years at a low rent, but with a covenant by the lessee to put and leave the premises in repair, it may be contended that such covenant is a "further or other valuable consideration," inasmuch as the property would immediately be worth more in the market than the value represented by the rent.

But in the case of a lease for ninety-nine years the value of the property has reference to the rent reserved and secured by the buildings built or agreed to be built, and the market value of the reversion is not increased by reason of the erections until some thirty or forty years are left unexpired; so that for the first sixty or seventy years the buildings are of no value to the lessor, further than as a security for his rent; and consequently during the whole of that period it is the rent, and that alone, which represents the value of the lessor's interest in the soil.

The case of a lease for 999 years—the usual term in Lancashire and North Cheshire—is still stronger, the grant being to all intents and purposes tantamount to a grant in fee; the only difference being that it gives the grantor a greater security for his rent by means of the proviso for re-entry, which he could not have in a grant in fee.

It appears from a case referred to in your number for the 12th instant that the Commissioners, when called upon to adjudicate upon the stamps affixed to a grant in fee in which the purchaser covenanted to do certain acts for the benefit of the vendor on his adjoining property, held that the deed was properly stamped, even though it had not the extra 35s. stamp affixed. Their decision, however, was quite the other way in the case of a Cheshire building lease for 999 years lately presented by my firm for adjudication. There they required the extra 35s. duty to be paid.

From this it would seem that the Commissioners are guided in their decisions, not so much by the question of value as by the fact whether there be or not a reversion reserved—where there is not the grantee may enter into any onerous covenants for the benefit of the grantor, but where there is (even though the reversion is not worth a dump) covenants to build or improve become a "further or other valuable consideration" in the opinion of the Commissioners; and the same rule is applied whether the lease be for 9 years, 99 years, or 999 years.

There would no doubt be some difficulty in determining when covenants to build, &c., do or do not add to the immediate value of the reversion, but this very difficulty I contend goes far to show that the Act of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, never was intended to apply to covenants contained in building leases; at all events it raises a doubt the benefit of which ought to be given to the subject and not to the Crown.

My argument, if it is worth anything, goes to show that according to the wording of the Act the decision in Boulton's case is erroneous; but though there is no appeal from that decision there is nothing to prevent the point being brought under the review of the Court of Exchequer in an appeal from an adjudication on another building lease.

This I understand is in contemplation, and if it is done I hope that the case selected will be a lease for 999 years.

Besides the inconsistency I have referred to there are several other inconsistencies resulting from the decision in Boulton's case, I will only refer to one.

Previously to the passing of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, the duplicates and counterparts of deeds were chargeable with the same duty as the original deed, where such duty did not amount to 5s., and where the same amounted to 5s. or upwards then with 6s., but with the proviso that in the latter case the duplicate should not be available unless stamped with a stamp denoting the payment of the full duty on the original deed, which consequently had to be produced at the Stamp Office to show that the full duty had been paid before having the denoting stamp affixed; and such is still the law as regards the counterparts of all deeds except leases, for by the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 59, s. 12, it is enacted that the above proviso should not apply to the counterparts of leases stamped with a 5s. duty, unless (which is seldom the case) signed by the grantor or lessor.

Now, according to the recent decision, the following might be the result—namely, that the counterpart of a building lease reserving a rent not exceeding £5, for which an ad valorem duty of sixpence is charged, could not be given in evidence unless it had the additional 35s. stamp, whereas the counterpart of a building lease reserving a rent of £25 or upwards could be given in evidence though only stamped with a 5s. stamp, notwithstanding it might be shown that the original had not been stamped in accordance with the decision in Boulton's case.

If this view be correct (a) the result may be that a lessor may sue a lessee on a counterpart of a lease stamped with a 5s. duty for a breach of covenant to build, even though the extra 35s. which ought to have been paid in respect of the very same covenant has not been paid.

Does not this again show that it was not the intention of the Legislature to impose anything more than the ordinary ad val. duty and progressive duty, if any, upon leases containing covenants to build or improve? J. E. W.

Lincoln's-inn, Feb. 23.

(a) This would appear to be your view by your note on "Lessor's" letter in your number of the 12th. According to this the stamps on a lease for ninety-nine years, and on the counterpart reserving a rent of £5 would be £3 16s., whereas those on a lease and counterpart for the same term reserving a rent of £25 would only be £2 6s.

The following has been forwarded to us for publication:—

Copy letter from Messrs. Jas. & Jno. Hopgood to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in relation to the Question involved in the Hon. R. Bourke's Parliamentary Notice for Friday, 25th February, 1870.

14, King William-street, Strand,
22nd February, 1870.

Sir,—The gravity of the question on which we now address you, will, we trust, be deemed a sufficient excuse for our so doing. The subject of this letter is the question lately discussed in the Court of Exchequer (Boulton's case) in relation to the stamps necessary for a certain class of leases.

At the risk of appearing pedantic, we would make the following general observations. They appear to us necessary, in order to put the question clearly, and free it from technicalities which would otherwise obscure it.

Leases of houses and buildings may be broadly divided into three classes:—

1. Where the property is let at its full annual value.
2. Where a lower rent is taken in consideration of a premium paid by the lessee.
3. Where a rent less than the full annual value is reserved in consideration of an outlay by the lessee in building or other improvements.

Every one acquainted with the subject knows that a lease on its face is granted in consideration of the rent and lessee's covenants, and every lease contains covenants according to the circumstances environing the property demised by it, and notably in cases where unfinished buildings are demised there is a covenant to complete such buildings within a certain time.

It is also well known that (almost without exception) houses and buildings erected by lessees are demised to them before the buildings are completed, the lessees being thereby enabled to raise money on security of the leases.

The present stamp duties payable on leases are settled by the Stamp Acts of 1850 and 1854, and the amount of such duties is based on scales depending on the quantum of rent reserved and the length of the term of years granted. Where a pecuniary premium is paid such premium involves a special further duty in respect of it.

The stamp duties are set forth in alphabetical schedules to the Acts, and any special matter requiring notice is introduced into these schedules by italicised notes; so that, practically, if you want to ascertain the stamp duty payable on any particular instrument, you merely refer to the schedules of the Acts.

There would seem, then, to be no ground for difficulty about the matter, and none has been felt until within the last few weeks, consequent upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer as to the stamps which ought to have been impressed on a lease of a house built by the lessee (a Mr. Boulton), demised at a ground rent before the house was completed, and containing, naturally and reasonably, a covenant by the lessee to complete it within a defined period.

[The letter then states the question decided in Boulton's case, 18 W. R. 351.]

One of the consequences of this decision is, that if the house had been finished when the lease was granted, no covenant to complete being requisite, no further stamp duty would be payable, but the house being unfinished and a covenant to complete being requisite, an additional duty of thirty-five shillings becomes payable in respect of this covenant, and thus, although the primary stamp (assuming the ground-rent to be under (say,) £10), would be six shillings, the additional stamp, incidental to what may be called a mere accidental circumstance in relation to the subject-matter of the demise, would be about six times as much.

Although this judgment has spread dismay and confusion throughout the country, seeing that it affects the validity of hundreds of thousands of deeds, and impedes daily a vast amount of business in which dealings with leasehold property are concerned, we feel that it is not within our province here to discuss its correctness. Nor is it within our province to offer an opinion as to the expediency, upon general rules of policy or special fiscal exigencies, of levying taxes of this nature. We merely venture, Sir, to call your attention to the imperative necessity of some immediate legislation in relation to the matter; the question is of far greater moment than any mere consideration of revenue. The interests of a vast number of persons (landlords as well as lessees) are affected, for it must be observed that, the stamps on counterpart leases being regulated by those on the leases themselves, there are thousands of counterpart leases in the muniment rooms of our great landed proprietors, which are improperly stamped according to the law as laid down by the Court of Exchequer, and these in their present state would be useless in any legal proceedings. We would also beg to remind you that in this instance no blame is attributable to any class of persons—the practice as to stamping leases has been uniform—the stamp office officials have construed the Acts in the same manner as that in which they have hitherto been construed by the legal profession, and have given formal opinions that no stamps other than those applicable to rent were payable. Our own professional experience enables us to appreciate the immense magnitude of the interests involved in this question, and the impossibility of remedying matters by an attempt now to stamp all deeds deficient in the additional stamp referred to. In our own office more than 3,500 leases, granted since the Act of 1854, have passed through our hands as solicitors for lessors, nearly all of which come within the principle of Boulton's case, and as the counterparts of a great proportion of these leases are also insufficiently stamped, according to the law as now laid down, it will be seen that upwards of 6,000 deeds affected by the decision in question, have passed through our office alone. Now seeing that the question applies to all England, Wales, and Scotland, and seeing also the enormous amount of building which has taken place within the last sixteen years throughout the country, it is obvious that the question is of such magnitude that it can only be satisfactorily dealt with by an Act of Parliament declaring that all leases duly stamped in other respects shall not be deemed invalid, so far as regards stamp laws, by reason only of the omission to stamp them with the additional stamp referred to; it will be obvious also that the law should be clearly laid down for the future guidance of the public in relation to this matter. Apologising for the length of this letter,

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your faithful Servants,

JAS. & JNO. HOGGOOD.

To the Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

BOULTON'S CASE—PROGRESSIVE DUTY, &c.

Sir,—I beg to send you a contribution to the literature of this now famous case, in regard to how (in the case of leases)

Progressive duty,
Duplicates and counterparts, and Assignments and surrenders not upon sale or mortgage, are affected by it; and in which your correspondent "Lessor," of a fortnight since, will find a response to his appeal for information.

Upon a study of the decision of the Court and of the Acts with reference to the above heads of duty, the following is the result:—

That the decision does not affect the progressive duty in cases where the ad valorem duty be less than 10s: thus—

(1) Lease for ninety-nine years at £5 ground rent 0 3 0

In respect of the consideration to build, or of covenants to build ... 1 15 0

Progressive duty ... 0 3 0

(2) But it does affect the counterpart or duplicate of such a lease, the duty on which will be ... 0 5 0
Progressive ... 0 2 6

(3) And an assignment or surrender of any such lease, not upon a sale or mortgage, the duty will be ... 0 3 0
Progressive ... 0 3 0

And the duplicate of such assignment, the same.

These propositions are deduced and founded thus:—

(1) The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 16, on which Boulton's case was decided, imposes the extra duty (35s.), "except progressive duty": therefore the progressive duties must follow the ad valorem duty.

(2) But under "duplicate or counterpart" the charge is "of any deed or instrument chargeable with any stamp duty or duties," &c.

(3) Then assignment or surrender of lease upon any other occasion than a sale or mortgage, a duty equal to the ad valorem duty with which a similar lease would be chargeable (vide schedules of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, and of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 111).

In the foregoing I have put the case of leases, but the result would be the same in the case of other kinds of deeds chargeable with ad valorem duty under 10s.; and to which the separate 35s. stamp would, under section 16 of the said 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83 (a), be chargeable. If, therefore, the foregoing statement of the operation of Boulton's case be correct—about which I venture to say there need be no doubt,—it will be readily marked that beyond the said 35s. stamp—as to which nothing more need now be advanced—the anomalies and inconsistencies flowing from the decision of the Court are most glaring, and still further reduce the little that was previously remaining of unity and harmony in the body of the Stamp Law, and so leave it thoroughly, as you say in your remarks, "rotten" for purposes of reference.

SCRUTATOR.

February 21.

(a) It is rightly suggested last week by "Veritas" that the decision in Boulton's case would not stop at leases, but would extend to the charging the separate 35s. stamp to other deeds.

COSTS.

Sir,—A case referred to in Pothier on Obligations, Evans' Ed. App. 13, seems to answer the question "Lex" asks in your last number.

In Pitts v. Carpenter, 1 Wilson, 19, it was held that the plaintiff, to whom a larger debt than 40s. was originally due, but whose demand was reduced by set-off to less than that sum, might bring his action in a superior court, and was not within the provisions of a local Act which confined debts of less than 40s. to an inferior jurisdiction.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 18.—Jurisdiction of Judges Bill.—The Lord Chancellor said the object of this bill was simply to enable any one judge of any one of the three superior courts at Westminster to sit, upon request, in any of the other courts, for every purpose, with the same jurisdiction and power as if originally appointed judge of the court to which he is so invited. It proposed to enable the Chief Justice or Chief Baron, on his court being overloaded, to invite to his assistance a judge from any of the other courts, and to enjoy the full benefit of his exertions (an assistance only partially rendered by two previous Acts). It further enabled the judges to sit in Banco in any one court in two divisions, and empowered more than two courts to sit at the same time in London or Westminster at Nisi Prius, that power being at present confined to two. This was a temporary measure which would provide for the present pressure of business in the Queen's Bench. The Government did not intend to fill up the vacancy caused by the lamented death of Mr. Justice Hayes, because seventeen judges (including the three lately appointed, who would for the present, at any rate, be available) was quite an adequate number. In the Chancery Appeal Court the illness of Lord Justice Rolt and other accidents had occasioned—when he (the Lord Chancellor) became Lord Justice—a year and a half's arrears, which were subsequently got rid of, and there were now only thirteen appeals awaiting hearing. He would now explain why the Government did not mean to fill up the vacancies. In March, 1867, the Judicature Commission was appointed. The inquiry was entered upon with the greatest anxiety, for it had long been the opinion that we had suffered grievously in our whole system of judicature—nay, in our whole system of jurisprudence—from the unhappy separation of our courts into two distinct branches, administering law on totally distinct principles. He supposed no civilised nation at any period of its history had failed to find an epoch when, from the desire of rendering justice fully and fairly to all persons, according to the various emergencies which arise as civilisation advances, it had found itself obstructed by those precautionary measures which tribunals from time to time thought fit to take in order to secure justice, but which at length, settled down into a rigidity of practice incapable of accommodating itself to the wants of mankind, necessarily brought about the very reverse,—viz., injustice, sometimes of the most serious description. Even Rome, hard and severe as her rules of common law at one time were, early learned, as time advanced and the various interests of civilisation required change, to entrust the prætor with the power of so far mitigating its severity as by degrees to introduce those changes which resulted, at a far later period, in the whole administration of justice being committed to one single tribunal, which had full power over every circumstance in the cases brought before it, and competent to administer full and complete justice. Scotland had had the benefit of that course of procedure with reference to the law of Rome, as also all the various countries of Europe which have in effect adopted the system of Roman law, though wisely modifying it by various codes of procedure of their own. But in this country it was not so. Originally, we were free from many of the difficulties which have since sprung up. Originally the Great Council of the King, dividing itself into various branches, administered the law, not, as afterwards, by separation into totally distinct Courts having no intercommunication with each other, but simply, as the division of labour required, by handing over to one or another branch those particular functions for which it was thought peculiarly competent, still with an interchange and intercommunication of the several branches of the judicature. The Privy Council was still framed very much more on that model than any of our Courts, for it never separated itself by hard and definite lines into separate Courts and jurisdictions, but retained the power of entrusting to committees the particular subject matters thought most expedient for separate investigation, always with the freest power of intercommunication and assistance. From the King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer being entrusted with various functions, it ultimately resulted that each in many respects held exclusive jurisdiction, introducing a rigidity and stiffness into the administration of law which was in itself disastrous. When, moreover, the evil became apparent, when the necessities of mankind required far more elasticity than any of those courts appeared to possess, when property passed more freely and a greater variety of rights arose, the Court of Chancery, which originally framed writs of procedure in the Courts of Common Law, and for a time kept pace with the wants of the age, by framing special writs for special circumstances, was compelled, by the difficulty of determining rights at Common Law, according to the strict system which had gradually grown up, to introduce a court of its own. It thus not only remedied the severity of the law, but (which some supposed to be its function, though that was not so, unless that severity contained some ingredient rendering it manifestly inequitable) adapted itself to the wants of mankind by specific remedies, such as the courts of law could not grant. In that way it took upon itself a jurisdiction wholly separate from the common law, and the consequence was two species of rights co-existing constantly in the same individual. He was entitled, therefore, to a remedy against his opponent by summoning him at common law; but while or after doing this, with full certainty of success, he might be declared by another jurisdiction to be as clearly in the wrong in the second court as he was clearly in the right in the first. He could not only be arrested on his proceedings in the first court, where he was entirely right, but arrested on penalty of costs for having attempted to assert his rights in that inequitable manner. That surely could not be a satisfactory state of things. Another ground of difficulty was the frequent inability of the common law to afford an adequate remedy. The Common Law Courts began at a time when there was great simplicity in the ordinary transactions of life, even in such small portions of dealing with contracts and mercantile affairs as came before them, and the general result was "aye" or "no" upon a single question, matters being brought to a simple issue of law or fact, to which the whole energies of the Common Law Judges were directed. They would scarcely hear of anything which could not be brought to a single point, and there had, therefore, to be a regular course of pleading, a regular statement of the case, a plea put in, replication to that plea, and so on, until the case was reduced to a distinct point of law or fact, whereupon the whole matter was one between A and B. No other parties could be introduced, and the question of fact was determined by a jury. The Court of Chancery, on the other hand, could enter into a complete investigation of any matter, however complicated, accommodating itself to every species of right and inquiry, simply stated in a bill. It required all parties interested to be brought before it, and gave great facilities for determining once for all the rights of all concerned. It had moreover several means of affording redress of which the common law was destitute, e.g., injunctions and specific performance. Unhappily, from a very early period there arose a jealousy of the Court of Chancery, which diminished its popularity, on account of its being administered at one time almost entirely by ecclesiastics, and of a notion that it introduced the Roman law, and that this was adverse to the principles of liberty. There was a great preference, too, for a decision by a jury over one by a single judge. But, whatever, the cause, the effects were for many years apparent. Thus, on the one hand, the Courts of Common Law by degrees became so rigid in their rules that a man not unfrequently lost his property through a mistake in the pleading or conduct of the case and through the plea being overruled, while on the other, great difficulties arose in the Court of Chancery through its becoming somewhat more fixed in its proceedings than formerly. Conflicts occurred in the reign of James I. between the two classes of courts, arising simply from a misapprehension of the state of the case, the interference of the Court of Chancery being not with the court but with the plaintiff, in respect of his not being entitled to take advantage of his remedy at common law. Not until late years had attention been drawn as it ought to have been to the great inconvenience of the separation of the two jurisdictions, which gave but too much ground to the saying that a litigant might be torn into two parts, one half of his case being decided at Common Law and the other in Chancery. Clearly a man should have his whole right determined by one court, whichever it might be, and the only plan was to entrust to one court jurisdiction over the whole subject-matter of any cause. As early as 1657 Sheppard (of Sheppard's Touchstone), in a book called England's Balm, pointed out this, and suggested what was afterwards carried out by "Cairns" and "Rolt's" Acts.

Sheppard also noticed the inconsistency of giving damages for injuries to the person to the sufferer alone and refusing them to his family in the event of his being killed, an anomaly remedied by Lord Campbell, and he recommended that a bankrupt's subsequently acquired property should be available for his creditors, a principle only adopted last session. The course of procedure by which Courts of Equity on the one hand were so hampered as to be supposed so wholly ignorant of law as to be obliged, if a point strictly of law arose, to send it to the Common Law Courts, and by which the latter Courts were prevented from doing their duty in the event of an injunction or other step being required, had been remedied, but only partially. A man had never been deemed disabled for the Lord Chancellorship because he had not been trained at Equity, although, when sitting in Equity, he was supposed to have forgotten all the law he ever learned, and would have to consult the Common Law Judges on a legal question. Lord Eldon was first Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Lord Erskine was also almost entirely a Common Law man, and of his successors five received their whole training at Common Law, five their whole training in Chancery, and Lord Cranworth happily combined both sources of instruction. Taking all these things into account, one cannot be surprised at the appointment of the Commission. The Court of Chancery had by degrees been considerably improved, commencing perhaps, though feebly, in 1815, with a Commission under Lord Eldon, the only result of which was the very necessary appointment of a Vice-Chancellor. After that, Lord Brougham's celebrated speech in 1828 stirred the public mind to its very depths: from that period dated the more general interest shown in this dry subject. Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, in 1827, commenced reforms by orders, and that course had been continued by successive Chancellors. In the time of Lord Truro a Commission was appointed, mainly at the instance of Lord Romilly, then Attorney-General, and there was in 1851 a Commission also on the Common Law Courts. Both those Commissions recommended that wherever a cause began there it should end, and that gave rise to some subsequent arrangements already mentioned. Lord Westbury had also done much to stir up public opinion. The present Commission reported in March, 1869. Subject to certain notes appended to some of the signatures, and to the objection of the judge of the Court of Admiralty, they unanimously agreed that all the Courts into which they were directed to inquire should be consolidated into one, and that that Court should have the power of dividing itself into separate divisions, not for the purpose of continuing the system of separate jurisdictions, but in order to hand over from time to time, like the Privy Council, the business proper to the particular division, subject to the reservation that any judge may sit in any division, and that if desirable a cause may be removed from one division to the other by the simple process of walking from one room into another. Great care should, however, be taken to avoid again hardening into a rigid system, incapable of application to the exigencies of the times. That should be provided for in this manner:—The High Court should, in itself, unite all the powers now vested in any of the Courts, or in the judges of any one of the Courts. Having these powers it should then commence the work of distribution—not acting in so rigid or settled a manner as to prevent its arrangements from being altered again, if necessary, by the same body, but laying down rules for the guidance and conduct of business, and also laying down rules as to pleading, endeavouring to make them as simple as possible. Without going into the considerable details as to the form of pleadings and the taking of evidence, the scheme resolved itself into this, that there would still be a Court of Chancery, or a Court equivalent to the Court of Chancery—for there was no great magic in names; there would still be a Court equivalent, in the same way, to the Courts of Queen's Bench, of Common Pleas, and Exchequer; and, lastly, a Court in which the business of the Courts of Probate, of Divorce, and of Admiralty would be carried out in the same division. It was thought desirable that the Court of Appeal should not be constituted of judges who had already exercised their functions in the Court of First Instance, though a few of these judges might be placed in the Court of Appeal. As to the Master of the Rolls, it was determined that he should be a judge of appeal, and should be removed from the Court of First Instance, and for this reason. In 1851 two Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery were appointed, who, together with the Lord Chancellor, formed the Court of Appeal; in which court, either the Lord Chancellor might sit alone, or the two Lords Justices might sit by themselves, or all three might be united in the hearing of causes. The Lords Justices are placed in the rank assigned to them by the Act of Parliament—next after the Lord Chief Baron; the Master of the Rolls, on the other hand, was third in the roll of legal dignities—the Lord Chancellor being first, the Chief Justice of England second. Accordingly, it was desirable that the Master of the Rolls should not occupy a position in the Court of First Instance; otherwise, his decisions, if overruled, would be capable of being overruled by two Lords Justices, inferior in professional rank to himself. But if he were removed to the Court of Appeal an additional judge would be necessary to supply his place in the earlier tribunal; and that was provided for by the Bankruptcy Act of last year, under which the Chief Judge of the Bankruptcy Court was appointed specially with a proviso that in any future appointment a judge of one of the superior courts should exercise the functions of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. With regard to the judges of the common law courts, the recommendation was that there should be five judges acting in each division, instead of six, as at present. There would thus remain three judges for the discharge of the other duties cast upon them. Of these three, one would be placed in the court which would deal usually with Admiralty, Divorce, and Probate proceedings; and thus we should have the same tribunal in point of number, and no doubt also in point of ability, as we now had in the Divorce Court. Two others would remain who might be otherwise usefully employed. There would be a permanent Court of Appeal, taking all cases, Common Law or Equity, indiscriminately. Over this Court the Lord Chancellor would preside; the Master of the Rolls would also be a member ex officio, together with four permanent Judges; and it would further consist of three Judges to be selected annually, from among the Judges of the Court of First Instance. This was a general outline of the plan proposed. Probably nine instead of ten Judges would be quite sufficient. It might be asked whether there were not special circumstances in the case of the Courts of Admiralty, of Probate and of Divorce; and undoubtedly their functions had been exclusively confined to a course of procedure having reference to those special matters; but cases were continually arising, especially under the enlarged powers which had been granted to the Court of Probate, which might as well be dealt with by one branch of the judicature as another. As regards the Admiralty, in time of war special and very difficult questions might arise; but in ordinary times it dealt solely with questions of property. And with regard to Admiralty practice, two wholly different principles were acted upon in the present day. If a ship be run down, and an action be brought at common law, and it is proved that there have been faults on both sides, the plaintiffs will fail to recover damages altogether; whereas in the Court of Admiralty, somewhat after the Jewish jurisprudence, the two losses are added together, and the Court determines in what proportion the burden shall be borne. To give other instances of inconveniences arising under the present system would be tiresome. The report also represented the unsatisfactory constitution at present of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. As to the circuits the report was not altogether satisfactory, and on that head it was not now intended to do more than abolish the Home Circuit. He had a further suggestion to make which he thought would be found of very great convenience, and would not diminish the jurisdiction of the House, namely, that, adopting a practice analogous to that at the Privy Council, their Lordships should at the commencement of every session appoint a committee of appeal—a judicial committee of the House. The committee might be empowered to sit during the recess and during prorogation; but it would not be necessary to continue that practice long, because the appeals would rapidly diminish. He also proposed that this committee should be empowered to call in aid any member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—the report of the Committee having always to be affirmed by the House. He proposed to embody these alterations in two bills—one applicable to the Court of First Instance and the other to the Court of Appellate Jurisdiction. He was not now prepared to lay the bills on the table, but hoped soon to do so. In conclusion, his Lordship rejoiced to think that at last the great public work was about to be commenced, and suitable law courts provided under one roof.

Lord Cairns said it was impossible to overrate the importance of the statement they had just listened to. At present he would only refer to one detail. It was thought by the Commission that the Appellate Court should consist of the Lord Chancellor and nine other judges, so that there might be some certainty of having three judges for each of the three divisions, and this he hoped would be carefully considered before introducing the bill. He approved the idea of having the appellate jurisdiction of the House conducted through a Judicial Committee in the same way as the appellate jurisdiction of the Privy Council is conducted by the Judicial Committee of that body; but never thought of advocating that such Judicial Committee should sit during the vacation. He did not think that the Judicial Committee of the House could be so composed as to enable its members during the time when the House was not sitting to devote attention to appeals. In conclusion, all were anxious that the reform should be passed in the best possible form, and that the great blot in the judicature of the country should be as speedily as possible removed.

Lord Westbury congratulated the House on the noble and extensive plan of reform now sketched. With respect to the appellate jurisdictions, as proposed, he saw some difficulties.

The bill was read a first time.

Feb. 22.—The Sunday Trading Bill was read a second time.

Feb. 24.—The Judges Jurisdiction Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Feb. 18.—Equalisation of Poor's Rate (Metropolis).—A bill by Mr. Goschen was read a first time.

Feb. 21.—The Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill was read a second time.

Assessment.—Mr. Goschen moved for a Select Committee on Local Taxation.

Sir M. Lopes moved, but ultimately withdrew, an amendment to postpone the committee until the whole question was in a position to be dealt with. The motion was agreed to, with the addition, at the suggestion of Mr. G. Hardy, of an alteration to make it clear that the inquiry would include local taxes expended for imperial purposes.

Mr. Corrance added an instruction to the Committee to inquire further into the proper classification of rates, with a view to determine their proper incidence upon the owners or occupiers of such rateable property.

Feb. 22.—The Avoidance of Sales of Next Presentation to Benefices Bill was read a first time.

Suburban Commons Protection.—Mr. Cowper-Temple introduced a bill.

Acknowledgment of Deeds by Married Women.—Mr. Dodds introduced a bill to facilitate the execution of deeds.

Election of Coroners.—Mr. Goldney introduced a bill to amend the law.

Public Prosecutor.—Mr. Eykyn introduced a bill.

Feb. 23.—Life Assurance Companies Bill.—Mr. Cave moved the second reading. The bill provided that life assurance companies should make simple uniform statements every year according to the model forms in the schedules, which, together with the actuarial report to be prepared at longer intervals, would enable people to compare the position of one office with that of another, and to judge of the solvency of any particular company. It also, as a natural corollary to those provisions, enabled policyholders to make application to the Court, and the Court to grant a winding-up order, when it should appear on the face of the returns that the company had insufficient assets to meet its prospective liabilities.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre cordially approved of the bill. He had himself suggested the last mentioned proviso, aimed at a want of winding-up jurisdiction suggested by the decision of James, V.C., in the European case.

Mr. Cave thought the bill was defective because it did not bind the company to re-purchase policies at surrender value, nor provide for a uniform surrender value. It also allowed a portion of capital to be lent on personal security.

Mr. McLaren thought the bill gave general satisfaction.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, after mentioning the great temptation to improvident dealing with funds in hand, and the puffing, touting, and bribing system of getting up the companies, as two unhappy peculiarities, feared the bill, though commendable in some respects—would not remedy these evils. Its mode of dealing with insolvency and transfer of business might be good, but as to the evils he had just mentioned, it was very unsubstantial. It was true that such an amount of Government interference with the accounts of companies, as was enforced in America, would not be tolerated here. He did not believe that any bill based on private associations could meet the difficulty. He would not force the subject, but if it were thought well that the Government should take up the business, he would be willing to act.

The bill was read a second time.

Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill.—Mr. Rathbone moved the second reading. The system of remunerating for preparation of documents by proportion to their length was repugnant to reason, and gave an opportunity to the unscrupulous. It did not recognise skill. Unless this were altered a measure to render land transfer cheap and expeditious was impossible.

The bill was read a second time.

Feb. 24.—The Corrupt Boroughs.—Mr. Pemberton asked the Solicitor-General whether he would inform the House against what persons prosecutions had been commenced or were contemplated by the Government in reference to the Bridgwater, Beverley, or Norwich elections.

The Solicitor-General said that, in regard to prosecutions actually commenced, he had to reply that in the case of Beverley sufficient informations had been exhibited against two persons—Sir H. Edwards and Mr. Burrell; and in that of Bridgwater against four—Dr. Hamilton Kinglake, Mr. Vanderbyl, Mr. Fennelly, and Mr. Lovibond. He had, however, to state with respect to Mr. Lovibond, that though those who advise the Crown in these matters were not satisfied with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench as to the power of revision where a certificate had been refused by Election Commissioners, yet, after the strong opinion pronounced by the Queen's Bench, the Attorney-General considered that, whatever might be the law of the case, the prosecution against Mr. Lovibond ought not to be proceeded with. In that view he entirely concurred, and though informations had been exhibited against Mr. Lovibond, he would not be prosecuted. In the case of Norwich the prosecutions would be against Mr. Stracey, Mr. Hardiment, Mr. Tarde, and Mr. Pennecfather.

The Compulsory Pilotage Abolition Bill was read a second time and referred to a Select Committee, with power to take evidence.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS REMUNERATION BILL.

The following is the text of the Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill (prepared and brought in by Mr. Rathbone, Mr. G. Gregory, Mr. Morley and Mr. Goldney):—

Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to the remuneration of attorneys and solicitors:

Be it enacted, &c:

Preliminary.

1. This Act may be cited as "the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870."

2. This Act shall not extend to Scotland or Ireland.

3. In the construction of this Act, unless where the context otherwise requires, the words following have the significations hereinafter respectively assigned to them; that is to say,

The words "attorney or solicitor" mean an attorney, solicitor, or proctor, qualified according to the provisions of the Acts for the time being in force, relating to the admission and qualification of attorneys, solicitors, or proctors:

"Person" includes a corporation:

"Client" includes any person who, as a principal or on behalf of another person, retains or employs, or is about to retain or employ, an attorney or solicitor, and any person who is or may be liable to pay the bill of an attorney or solicitor for any services, fees, costs, charges or disbursements.

Part I.—Agreements between attorneys or solicitors and their clients.

4. An attorney or solicitor may make an agreement in writing with his client respecting the amount and manner of payment for the whole or any part of any past or future services, fees, charges, or disbursements in respect of business done or to be done by such attorney or solicitor, whether as an attorney or solicitor or as an advocate or conveyancer, either by a gross sum, or by commission or percentage, or by salary or otherwise, and either at the same or at a greater or at a less rate as or than the rate at which he would otherwise be entitled to be remunerated, subject to the provisions and conditions in this part of this Act contained.

5. Such an agreement shall not affect the amount of, or any right or remedies for the recovery of, any costs recoverable from the client by any other person, or payable to the client by any other person, and any such other person may require any costs payable or recoverable by him to or from the client to be taxed according to the rules for the time being in force for the taxation of such costs, unless such person has otherwise agreed.

6. Such an agreement shall be deemed to exclude any further claim of the attorney or solicitor beyond the terms of the agreement in respect of any services, fees, charges, or disbursements in relation to the conduct and completion of the business in reference to which the agreement is made, except such services, fees, charges, or disbursements, if any, as are expressly excepted by the agreement.

7. Such an agreement shall not, unless by express stipulation, defeat any lien of an attorney or solicitor as such on the documents, moneys, or securities of his client, and in any case in which any property recovered or preserved in any suit, matter, or proceeding may be charged with the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of the attorney or solicitor through whose instrumentality such property has been recovered or preserved, such property may be charged with the amount agreed upon by any such agreement in lieu of such taxed costs, charges, or expenses.

8. A provision in any such agreement that the attorney or solicitor shall not be liable for negligence, or that he shall be relieved from any responsibility to which he would otherwise be subject as such attorney or solicitor, shall be wholly void.

9. No action or suit shall be brought upon any such agreement, unless as hereinafter provided; and every question respecting the validity or construction of any such agreement may be examined and determined, and the agreement may be enforced, without suit or action, on motion or petition of any person, or the representative of any person, a party to such agreement, or being or alleged to be liable to pay, or being or claiming to be entitled to be paid, the costs, fees, charges, or disbursements in respect of which the agreement is made, by the court in which the business was done, or a judge thereof, or if the business was not done in any court, then where the amount payable under the agreement exceeds £50, by any superior court of law or equity or a judge thereof, and where such amount does not exceed £50, by the judge of a county court which would have jurisdiction in an action upon the agreement; but the court or judge may refuse to make any rule or order on such motion or petition, and may give leave to the person seeking to enforce the agreement to bring an action at law, or to take such other proceedings as he may be advised.

10. The court or judge before whom any such agreement is sought to be enforced or set aside may, if satisfied that any undue advantage was taken in making the agreement by any party thereto, require the agreement to be given up, and may direct the costs, fees, charges, and disbursements to be taxed according to the rules for the time being in force for the taxation of the same.

11. When the amount agreed for under any such agreement has been paid by or on behalf of the client, or by any person chargeable with or entitled to pay the same, any court or judge having jurisdiction to examine and enforce such an agreement may, upon application by the person who has paid such amount, within twelve months after the payment thereof, if it appears to such court or judge that the special circumstances of the case require the agreement to be re-opened, re-open the same, and order the costs, fees, charges, and disbursements to be taxed, and the whole or any portion of the amount received by the attorney or solicitor to be repaid by him, on such terms and conditions as to the court or judge may seem just.

12. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to give validity to any purchase by an attorney or solicitor of the interest of his client in any suit, action, or other contentious proceeding to be brought or maintained, or to give validity to any agreement by which an attorney or solicitor retained or employed to prosecute any suit or action, stipulates for payment only in the event of success in such suit, action, or proceeding.

13. Nothing in this Act contained shall give validity to any disposition, contract, settlement, conveyance, delivery, dealing, or transfer, which may be void or invalid against a trustee or creditor in bankruptcy, arrangement, or composition, under the provisions of the laws relating to bankruptcy.

14. Where an attorney or solicitor has made an agreement with his client in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, and anything has been done by such attorney or solicitor under the agreement, and before the agreement has been completely performed by him, such attorney or solicitor dies or becomes incapable to act, an application may be made to any court which would have jurisdiction to examine and enforce the agreement by any party thereto, or by the representatives of any such party, and such court may order the amount due in respect of the past performance of the agreement to be ascertained by taxation, and the taxing officer in ascertaining such amount shall have regard so far as may be to the terms of the agreement, and payment of the amount found to be due may be enforced in the same manner as if the agreement had been completely performed by the attorney or solicitor.

15. Except as in this part of this Act provided, the bill of an attorney or solicitor for the amount due under an agreement made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act shall not be subject to any taxation, nor to the provisions of the Act of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and the Acts amending the same respecting the signing and delivery of the bill of an attorney or solicitor.

Part II.—General Provisions.

16. An attorney or solicitor may take security from his client for his future fees, charges, and disbursements, to be ascertained by taxation or otherwise.

17. When an attorney or solicitor is hereafter appointed a trustee or executor under any deed or will, then, unless the deed or will otherwise directs, he may, by himself or his partners, act as solicitor or attorney in all matters relating to the deed or will, and shall be entitled to his professional costs and charges in the same manner as if he were not such trustee or executor, subject to the provisions following; that is to say.

- (1.) If the deed or will provides a certain remuneration expressed to be in respect of any professional services, he shall not under this section be entitled to any further remuneration for such services:
- (2.) If the deed or will appoints co-trustees or co-executors jointly with him, he shall not so act or be entitled to such costs or charges without the consent in writing of his acting co-trustees or co-executors for the time being:
- (3.) When the aggregate amount of such costs and charges exceeds ten pounds, whether or not any part of such aggregate amount has been paid previously or on account, he shall before taking payment of such amount or of the balance thereof, submit a full account of such amount and of the items thereof to the taxing officer of a superior court of equity, and such taxing officer shall have power either to allow the same, or if he thinks any part thereof unnecessary or unreasonable, to tax such part or the whole thereof in the ordinary manner, and to declare what sum, if any, is due to or from such attorney or solicitor on the whole account.

18. Subject to any general rules or orders hereafter to be made upon every taxation of costs, fees, charges, or disbursements, the taxing officer may allow interest at such rate and from such time as he thinks just on moneys disbursed by the attorney or solicitor for his client, and on moneys of the client in the hands of the attorney or solicitor.

19. Upon any taxation of costs, the taxing officer may, in determining the remuneration to be allowed to the attorney or solicitor for his services, have regard, subject to any general rules or orders hereafter to be made, not only to the length of documents or the time occupied in rendering services, but also to the skill, labour, and responsibility involved.

RE-VESTING OF MORTGAGES BILL.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the law of real property with respect to the revesting of mortgaged estates in mortgagors:

Be it enacted, &c.

1. From and after the passing of this Act, it shall be lawful for the mortgagee named in any mortgage-deed or instrument, or for the executors, administrators, or assigns of such mortgagee, to indorse upon such mortgage-deed or instrument a receipt for all moneys intended to be secured by such mortgage, which shall be sufficient to vacate the same and re-vest the estate of and in the property comprised in such mortgage, whether the same shall be of freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or other tenure, in the person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption without it being necessary for such mortgagee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, to make or execute any reconveyance of the property so mortgaged, which reconveyance shall be in the form specified in the schedule hereunto annexed, or to the like purport or effect.

2. Every such receipt shall be chargeable with the same stamp duty as would have been payable on a reconveyance of the mortgaged property.

3. This Act shall not extend to Scotland.

SCHEDULE to which this Act refers.

Form of Receipt.

In pursuance of "An Act to facilitate the revesting of mortgaged estates in mortgagors," I (or we) the undersigned, being the mortgagee (or mortgagees) within mentioned (or the executors, administrators, or assigns of the within-mentioned mortgagee or mortgagees, as the case may be), do hereby acknowledge to have received all moneys intended to be secured by the within-written indenture. As witness my (or our) hand (or hands) this — day of — 18 .

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, February 24.

There is nothing new in our legal circles. The serjeanty vacant by the promotion of Mr. Dowse to the Solicitor-Generalship, has not yet been given away. Christopher Palles, Q.C., and David Sherlock, Q.C., M.P., are spoken of for it. Both are now occupying a very high position at our chancery bar, Mr. Palles, though comparatively a young man, having within the last couple of years stepped into the foremost place amongst the practising bar.

The nomination for the county of Tipperary took place yesterday. Mr. Heron, Q.C., the late opponent of O'Donovan Rossa, was again proposed, and Mr. C. Kickham, who had been convicted of treason-felony, as a colleague of Rossa's (as one of the three deputy head-centres in the absence of Stephens) was also put forward. A county gentleman was also proposed, but retired in favour of Kickham. The latter, who is a quiet-looking man of literary tastes, is deaf, and was, as well as I can recollect, discharged from penal servitude on account of ill-health. He has not figured in public since his discharge, and, but that the Irishman newspaper has been publishing some old letters of his, dated 1864, and of a truculent though national character, would have almost been forgotten.

OBITUARY.

LORD BARCAPLE.

We have to record the death of Lord Barcaple, one of the judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, who expired at his residence, Ainslie-place, Edinburgh, on the 23rd February, in the sixty-second year of his age. Lord Barcaple, formerly known as Mr. Edward Francis Maitland, was a son of the late Adam Maitland, Esq., of Dundrennan, his mother being a niece of Dr. Thomas Cairns, of the same place. He was born in Edinburgh on the 16th April, 1808, and was educated at the High School and University of Edinburgh. In 1831 he was admitted a member of the Scottish Faculty of Advocates, and was appointed an advocate-depute in 1847. In 1851 he was nominated sheriff of Argyllshire, and was appointed Solicitor-General for Scotland in 1854, but retired from office in 1858. Mr. Maitland was re-appointed Solicitor-General in 1859, and served in that office till 1862, when he was raised to the bench as a judge of the Court of Session, taking the title of Lord Barcaple from his grandfather's estate in Kircudbright. In 1859 he was appointed curator and assessor of the University of Edinburgh, and was elected rector of the University of Aberdeen in 1860, in which year the degree of doctor of laws was conferred upon him by the senate of the first-named body. Lord Barcaple married, in 1840, Ann, daughter of William Roberts, Esq., a Glasgow banker, by which lady (who died in 1854) he had a family of four sons and two daughters.

MR. E. BEAVAN.

Mr. Edward Beavan, barrister-at-law, died at Wimbledon Park on the 15th February, after a long illness, of paralysis. The late Mr. Beavan was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in May, 1844, and was a member of the North Wales Circuit. He had been for many years Counsel to the Board of Inland Revenue.

MR. M. L. JOBLING.

The death of Mr. Mark Lambert Jobling, solicitor, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, took place at his residence, Barras Bridge, on the 19th February. The late Mr. Jobling was a solicitor of long standing at Newcastle, having been certificated as far back as Michaelmas Term, 1824. On the formation of the Court of Probate he was appointed to the office of registrar for the Northumberland district, including Newcastle and Berwick-upon-Tweed. For several years Mr. Jobling held a seat in the Town Council of Newcastle, and in 1851 he was elected to the office of sheriff, during the mayoralty of Mr. Alderman Armstrong. He was Deputy Grand Master of the Order of Freemasons, and took considerable interest in all matters tending to promote the welfare of the craft; he was also an ardent supporter of the Newcastle Wrestling Society and the Northumberland Cricket Club.

MR. W. P. P. RABY.

The death of Mr. William Parker Poole Raby, solicitor, took place at Cardiff on the 10th February. The deceased gentleman was the son of the late Rev. W. Raby, incumbent of Wetherby, in Yorkshire, and was certificated in Hilary Term, 1861. A few years afterwards he commenced practice at Cardiff, where he soon secured a large police and county court practice. In February, 1868, he was appointed a lieutenant in the 3rd Glamorganshire (Cardiff) Volunteer Artillery, and his funeral took place with military honours.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society, held in the hall of the Hon. Society of Clement's-inn, Clement's-inn, Strand, on Wednesday, February 23, with Mr. Debney in the chair, Mr. Streeter moved—"That women be no longer excluded from becoming members of all the learned professions." After a very animated discussion the motion was lost by a very large majority.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

LECTURES AND LAW CLASSES AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Mr. FITZROY KELLY, Lecturer and Reader on Equity—Monday, February 23, class A; Tuesday, March 1, class B; Wednesday, March 2, class C—4.30 to 6 p.m.

Mr. H. W. ELPHINSTONE, Lecturer and Reader on Conveyancing and the Law of Real Property—Friday, March 4,—Lecture, 6 to 7 p.m.

The proposal to appoint a stipendiary magistrate for Portsmouth has been rejected by the Town Council of that borough. Last year 1,789 prisoners were brought before the magistrates, and it was urged that the increasing business of the borough rendered it essential that Portsmouth should follow the example of other large towns in having a gentleman qualified by legal knowledge to sit on the bench. Only four members of the Town Council, however, voted in favour of the proposition. In the course of the discussion it was stated that the fees of the magistrates' clerk amounted to £2,000 a-year.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Consols opened heavily, and some large sales effected a further depression, which was augmented by a large demand of money throughout the early part of the week. A recovery, however, seems now to have set in. Foreign securities, which throughout the week have been firm, are now still stronger. Railways were at first persistently heavy, but have latterly improved, and Metropolitan, in consequence of Vice-Chancellor James' refusal of the motion for an injunction in the case of Salisbury v. Metropolitan Railway Company this day have had a brisk rise. Some favourable reports issued by telegraph companies keep those investments still in favour.

The prospectus of the Anglo-Malteze Hydraulic Dock Company (Limited), with a capital of £150,000 in 7,500 shares of £20 each was issued this week. £68,000 has already been subscribed, and it is supposed that not more than £16 per share will be required.

The prospectus of the South Plynlimon Mining Company (Limited), with a capital of £24,000 in 12,000 shares of £2 each, has been issued. The object of this company is to develop the mineral wealth of the extensive and valuable property known as "South Plynlimon," situate in the parish of Llanbadarnfawr, in the county of Cardigan, in the centre of an immensely rich mining district.

A public lecture on "The Principles and Probable Operation of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869," was delivered at King's College, London, by Professor John Cutler, Barrister-at-Law, on Wednesday evening last. There was a good attendance, comprising several well-known members of both branches of the profession. Mr. Cutler divided his section into four heads—The History of Bankruptcy Law, the Objections to the Act of 1861, the Principles of the Act of 1869, and the Probable Operation of the New Law. The tenor of his remarks upon the fourth head were as follows:—That the Act of 1869 was founded to a great extent on the Scotch law, and that by it the administration and realisation of the assets belong to the creditors, and the decision of all legal points, and the bankrupt's character and liberty, belong to the Court. That at the first stage, all proceedings, whether in bankruptcy, liquidation, by arrangement, or composition, come before the Court. When the Court has decided that they are within the scope of the Act, the proceedings are remitted to the creditors to be carried on by them, or some person or persons appointed by them. The superintending authority of the Court is, however, ready to come into operation at any time if required. In their last stage on all cases the proceedings come again under the authority of the Court. The success or non-success of the Act will depend, to a great extent, on the Court, and to a great extent on the way in which the trustee system works in this country. The working of it in Scotland shows that the expenses of the bankruptcy swallow up, on an average, only about 13½ per cent. of the assets, but the costs in large estates are below, and in small above the average, because there are so many items which are the same whether the estate be large or small. The courts must take a comprehensive and equitable view of the Act. This the Chief Judge may be expected to do, he being an eminent equity lawyer, but it is doubtful whether the majority of county court judges will do so, they having been trained up at the common law bar. Again, much will be delegated to the registrars both in London and in the country. They will have power to adjourn questions for the decision of the judge by whom they are delegated. If they exercise this power too sparingly they will often take upon themselves to decide points on which they are not competent to decide; if they exercise it too freely they will unnecessarily cause delay and multiply expense.

Mr. Hall Dare, late secretary to the Royal Agricultural Society of England, has been appointed under-treasurer to the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple.

The revenue officials at New York have issued warrants for the arrest of a number of New York lawyers for not paying the special tax.

Mr. W. Consitt Boulton, solicitor of Hull, has been elected a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

Alpine, California, advertises for a lawyer—"a young, energetic fellow."

LONDON, MARCH 5, 1870.

THE JUDGES' JURISDICTION BILL has passed the House of Lords with but few and unimportant amendments. As it now stands, upon a request from the chief justice of one court to the chief justice of any other court, a judge of the latter court may assist in the former. No objection is to be taken to the jurisdiction of a judge so assisting on the ground that there has been no such previous request. We think it would have been simpler, if this is all that must be done, merely to extend the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 45, s. 1, under which and former Acts the judges sit for each other at chambers, to business in court. The process of a request seems unnecessary, and, by suggesting a formality, may prevent the judges acting on the bill as habitually as they otherwise might. Many of the occasions when the assistance of a judge in another court would be most useful, cannot be foreseen; the case of trials at Nisi Prius to which we referred last week being one. The bill is a purely permissive one in every sense, and does not even, like the Liquor Traffic Bill, permit certain persons to exercise compulsory powers over others. Probably it was thought desirable by the Legislature, though, of course, within these powers, to impose compulsorily on the judges duties in other courts than those in which they hold their offices.

The Legislature, or rather the House of Lords, has been content, and very properly, in our opinion, with giving a hint to the judges of the course they desire them to take. That being so, we think they might have given it more clearly than they have done, and that, under the bill as it stands, there will be no practical alteration in the trial of causes at Nisi Prius. This being a matter of practice, the Legislature might well have adopted the course they have taken in many late Acts of Parliament, of authorising the judges to make rules; and empowered them to make rules for the attendance before any judge of jurymen, parties, and witnesses, and generally rules under which cases at Nisi Prius might be tried more conveniently, expeditiously, and cheaply than at present. The scheme we desire to see carried out, whether under rules or an Act of Parliament, is something of this sort. That during the sittings in term, three judges, and after them six judges, should sit at Nisi Prius regularly until the cases entered for trial at those sittings in all the courts are disposed of. No more than say four causes should be entered in the day's list for any judge, but upon his disposing of those cases he should take cases from the list of any judge who had met with longer cases. Thus there would be every probability of all cases coming on on the first day they appeared on the list. At present the parties and their witnesses and the jurors are fortunate if their case comes on on the second or third day of their attendance, and they may have to wait a week. Of course our numbers are mere suggestions, but it is evident that it is much easier to estimate the number of cases that six judges sitting separately will dispose of in a day, than the number that one will. The short causes in one court will balance the long ones in another, and it is much more unlikely that six judges will each meet with a long case to begin with than that one judge will.

WE PRINT IN ANOTHER COLUMN a report of a case in the Exeter County Court, in which a point of great importance, though not, we think, of any great difficulty, had to be decided. Section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, says that "any covenant or contract made by a trader, in consideration of marriage, for the future settlement upon or for his wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not, at the date of his marriage, any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent, in possession or remainder, and not being money or property of or in right of his wife, shall, upon his becoming bankrupt, and before such property or money has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to such contract or covenant, be void against his trustee appointed under the Act." It was sought, but sought in vain, in the case we refer to, to apply this section to a covenant in consideration of marriage entered into long before the Act came into operation. It has long been a settled rule of construction that statutes which affect rights as distinguished from those which affect mere procedure, are not to be construed retrospectively, so as to affect rights already in existence, unless such an intention be clearly expressed; and if there ever was a case falling within the rule, the case we refer to seems to us to do so.

WE PRINTED LAST WEEK a little bill introduced by Mr. Dodds, with the very laudable object of diminishing the trouble and expense attendant on the revesting of mortgaged estates when the mortgage is paid off. The object of the measure, as explained by its introducer, was to render a re-conveyance unnecessary by substituting for it a simple receipt endorsed upon the mortgage-deed.

The 5th section of the Building Societies Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32) carried out the same principle with regard to mortgages made to building societies, by enacting that a receipt endorsed on the mortgage-deed by the trustees for the time being should of itself vest the estate in the mortgaged premises "in the person or persons for the time being entitled to the equity of redemption." The bill which we printed last week was an exact adaptation of that section, "the mortgagee, his executors, administrators, and assigns" being substituted for the "trustees for the time being" of the building society. Now, in the simple case in which a mortgage has never been transferred, or gone through any other devolution of title on the mortgagee's part, the reconveyance is already a matter of extreme cheapness and simplicity. To endorse the few lines now necessary in such a case costs scarcely anything more than to endorse the receipt. It is, we presume, the case in which there has been a devolution of mortgagee's title, which may necessitate lengthy recitals, that Mr. Dodds wishes to provide for, and the section borrowed from the Building Societies Act had reference only to the case in which there had been no devolution of title, the mortgagee being the same, though represented by a different set of trustees. All that that section does is to save the expense of reciting all the various appointments of trustees which may have taken place since the mortgage was made. It does not at all follow that the section, mutatis mutandis, could be applied to any other case.

The bill, however, which we printed last week has been abandoned, and a new one introduced, which, as it is equally short, we print in another column. The new bill enacts that, whenever "any person competent to give a discharge" for the mortgage money shall acknowledge payment in writing, "thereupon the mortgaged premises shall be held for the same estates on interests, and in the manner and right in all respects as the same would have been held had such mortgage never been made." Giving its framer credit for his good intentions, this provision seems to us as inefficient as its predecessor. It will be of little, if any use, where there has been any devolution of mortgagee's title. A receipt endorsed by a person "competent to give a discharge" for the money will be of no use unless it is accompanied by recitals tracing the title of such person, to say nothing of the fact that, ex concessis, the provision could be of no use whatever in those numerous cases in which the difficulty is how to get hold of that person. The only advantage accruing from the enactment would be that the concurrence of the real representative would no longer be necessary in cases of intestacy; on the other hand, it might afford additional facilities for misleading innocent persons in cases in which the mortgage money found its way into wrong hands.

* In Pease v. Jackson, 17 W. R. 1, Lord Cairns said that this was an obscure phrase, but that it must mean one of two things:—either that when the mortgagor repays, the estate shall vest in him, or that, whoever pays, the estate shall vest in that person who happens to have the best title to call for the equity of redemption. It did not, his Lordship said, mean simply the next equitable incumbrancer in point of time.

THE NATURALISATION BILL presented to the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor was read a second time on Thursday night. The bill embodies, to a great extent, the recommendations of the Royal Commission on naturalisation and allegiance which reported last year, and proposes some important alterations in the present law. It is our intention to discuss the bill in extenso, but pending our so doing it may be desirable to indicate the nature of the proposed alterations. Firstly, an alien is henceforth to be on the same footing, in the United Kingdom, with respect to property, both real and personal (except ships), as a natural born British subject, except that he is not to be qualified thereby "for any office, or for any municipal, parliamentary, or other franchise." Secondly, the jury de medietate linguæ is to be abolished. Thirdly, naturalisation in a foreign state is to convert a British subject into an alien, with a reservation in favour of those who have been so naturalised at the time of the passing of the Act. Fourthly, an alien to whom a certificate of naturalisation is granted shall not, when within the state of which he was previously a subject, be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject of such state in pursuance of the laws thereof or of any treaty. Fifthly, a certificate of naturalisation is henceforth to entitle to all "political and other rights, powers, and privileges." Sixthly, a natural-born British subject who has become an alien under the Act, may obtain a certificate of re-admission to British nationality on certain conditions. Seventhly, a married woman is to follow the nationality of her husband, and minors, with certain restrictions, the nationality of their father, or mother if the father be dead. Eighthly, the Government to have power to cancel the certificate of naturalisation in certain cases.

It will be seen that the bill proposes to knock on the head the maxim of our law—nemo protest exere patriam—which has been tacitly given up for some time, and the personal abandonment of which will relieve us from a possible collision with the United States on that subject. Thus far the bill is a fulfilment of the protocol signed with Mr. Reverdy Johnson in 1868. The only important objection to the bill urged on the second reading was that a British subject who has become an alien ought not to be allowed to repatriate himself without the consent of the government of the country he had adopted.

WHILE SCHEMES are being broached for negotiating transfers of the existing policies, the "business" in short, of insurance companies now being wound up by the Court, to new companies which are to be formed expressly to take over the business in question, it is worth while to consider whether or not the Companies Act, 1862, authorises any such arrangement to be carried out. Sections 161, 162 prescribe the manner in which such a transfer of business may be made, where the liquidation is "voluntary." But in Re General Exchange Bank, 15 W. R. 477, Lord Romilly held, three years ago, that in the case of a "compulsory" winding-up the Court has no power to enforce or carry out such a transfer while a single shareholder dissents. The 95th section, he said, did not contemplate the sale of a company's business as a going concern to another company, who undertook (as in the particular case before him) to pay the old company's debts by instalments. It has been urged that, although the Legislature has prescribed the manner in which a transfer may be carried out in a voluntary winding-up, and has not expressly provided for such a transfer in the case of a compulsory winding-up, it need not necessarily be taken as having, by implication, forbidden the transfer where the winding-up is compulsory. Its silence in the latter case might be attributable simply to its not considering any restriction necessary in the case of a compulsory liquidation, which is more under the immediate control of the Court than a voluntary one. However that may be, we understand that Lord Romilly has, in a very recent case which came before him in chambers, adhered to the principle of his decision in the General Exchange Bank case. On the other hand, it is believed that in many cases transfers of business have actually been made by companies under compulsory liquidation, without the liquidation being first converted into a voluntary one (which Lord Romilly said he could not permit unless all parties agreed). If the decision in the General Exchange Bank case is correct in its interpretation of the law, it will be impossible to effect a transfer in the case of any large insurance concern, as long as one single shareholder is discontented with the terms of the arrangement.

MR. MURPHY, THE PROTESTANT LECTURER, has tried conclusions, in an action for false imprisonment, with the Mayor of Birmingham and the Chief Superintendent of Police. Our readers may require to be reminded of the obscure details of the wrongs of Mr. Murphy, which are, indeed, only worth a reference now from the important principles really involved in the controversy between the municipal authorities and himself. Murphy is by profession "a lecturer in favour of Protestantism," and, on the 14th June, 1869, went in company with "his friend Mr. Smith" to a meeting at Birmingham about the Irish Church. Smith and Murphy both had platform tickets. Smith passed the ticket collector, like any other Smith, without observation; but as the great Murphy advanced to give up his ticket, two superintendents of police seized him by the collar, and told him that the mayor would be glad to see him in the committee-room. Murphy said he should be very pleased to see the mayor, but the invitation seems to have been a ruse, for, after all, it turned out that the mayor did not want to see Murphy. Instead of being ushered into the august presence of the chief magistrate, Murphy was "shoved downstairs." When he got to the bottom he had an interview with the chief constable (one of the defendants), who said, "You shan't go to the meeting . . . the mayor (the other defendant) says if you will go home quietly, he will see you escorted safely." But this was the last thing Murphy meant to do. He declared he would not go home, "certainly not"; whereupon he was marched off to the police-station and detained there five hours. At about 12 o'clock at night he was bailed out.

Now, that Murphy had a right of action for this imprisonment is unquestionable; although, to most people who know anything of Birmingham and the feuds between Protestant and Papist which of late years have more than once disgraced the town, the defendants, the ex-mayor and chief constable, will not appear to have been guilty of any very heinous offence. In plain English, what they wanted to do was, at any risk, to prevent a possible riot, which might have been attended by serious consequences. Still, in England there is no power of arbitrarily detaining a man merely because you may suppose he will be a disturber of the public peace. Accordingly, Baron Cleasby directed the jury at the recent trial, correctly, that the imprisonment was illegal. The amount of damages to which the Protestant hero was entitled was another matter. It was clear he had sustained no actual personal injury beyond a short infringement of his liberty. However, after a long deliberation the jury awarded him forty shillings by way of damages, and the learned judge certified for costs. The general opinion will probably be that the defendants did a right thing in a wrong way, and are therefore not wholly undeserving of pecuniary punishment. The lighter that punishment, the better everyone except the plaintiff would have been pleased. As it is the defendants will have been put to great expense by this action.

THE OPINION OF THE LAW OFFICERS of the Crown on the subject of county court committals does not appear to have had the desired effect, namely, that of producing uniformity in the practice of the courts (vide ante 187). Some of the London courts refuse to allow any order of committal of last year to be acted on, regardless of the question whether they are "in conformity with the provisions of the Debtors Act, 1869," or not. In other courts these committals are held to be ("if in conformity" &c., which they mostly are) as valid as if made this year. The consequences of this difference of practice were strongly brought out at the Lambeth court on Wednesday last. A plaintiff applied to the judge for advice under the following circumstances. He had obtained an order of committal in December last, and the warrant had been sent to the Bow court for execution. The High Bailiff there had refused to arrest on the ground that the warrant bore date December, 1869, and that he had orders from his court not to execute any such warrant. The plaintiff was therefore in this position:—The registrar of the court refused to issue another judgment summons, because an order of committal was in existence, and would continue so a year from its date. Plaintiff would therefore have to wait nearly a year before he could take any further proceedings, although he believed his claim would be met immediately on the defendant being arrested. The learned judge said he had done all he could in the matter; he had made the order, but he could not compel the officer of another court to execute it, and he declined to advise the plaintiff as to what course he should adopt. It appears from this that the only chance the plaintiff has of getting his money for some ten months to come is to catch his defendant in the Lambeth district, when the bailiff will at once introduce him to the Governor of Horse-monger-lane jail; but, if he stays at Bow, the Queen's writ of capias has no terrors whatever for him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER has introduced a bill which, as we understand, for we have not yet seen the bill, grants an indemnity up to the date of the decision in Boulton's case (18 W. R. 351) in respect of all previous leases within the purview of the decision and not stamped with the extra 35s. We were much surprised on reading the report of what took place in the House of Commons on February 25th to find it stated that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue made their discovery four years ago, and had been enforcing it ever since. We cannot, of course, pretend to say when the discovery was made, but as to the period when it was put in practice we are in a better position to offer an opinion, for, although we have made some inquiries, we have not heard of a single instance in which the question had been raised prior to Boulton's case, and the cases immediately preceding and which led up to it. We are glad, therefore, to see that the indemnity is to be brought down to the date when the law was laid down by the recent decision.

THE ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS REMUNERATION BILL.

The bill which we printed last week has in reality been before the public and the legal profession since last August. A bill in the same words was introduced by Mr. Rathbone towards the close of last session, not with any hope or even any intention of its then becoming law, but with the very laudable purpose of affording to all sides an opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted betimes with a measure which it was intended to push forward in the session now in progress. There has, therefore, been ample time for legislators to make themselves acquainted with the measure and its bearings.

Under the present system the rigid tariff which alone the Court can apply remunerates work of every kind, not by the real amount of "work done," but by a measurement which bears no reference whatever either to the responsibility incurred or the skill or labour required. The disadvantages of such a method of computing the payment are obvious. It may very possibly be that by some process of self-adjustment the remuneration thus prescribed is, on the average, sufficiently fair as between the client and the solicitor, though we must not be understood as expressing any opinion that this is so. However that may be, a mode of computation so utterly irrational is highly inconvenient in many ways. So far as it can succeed it succeeds by making one task pay for another; it is unsatisfactory to clients; it places the more scrupulous practitioners at a disadvantage as compared with their less honourable brethren; and it fosters mere verbosity in conveyancing and mere technicality in every department of the law. These evils were well pointed out in an able paper written by Mr. Edwin Field as far back as 1846. Mr. Field's paper was the means of Lord Langdale's placing himself in communication with the Incorporated Law Society upon the subject; and in a communication made to Lord Langdale by a special committee of that society the defects of the present system were again forcibly pointed out in the following terms:—

"The present system of taxation of costs uses length of written documents as the principal, and in many cases the only measure of professional remuneration, making no distinction whether a case has been difficult or otherwise, whether much or little responsibility has been incurred, much credit given and capital advanced, or none, and applying the same unvarying scale of allowance to trifling and unimportant matters. . . . It would be premature now to make any suggestions of detailed alterations in the present scale of taxation; but it appears to us that the best alteration that can be made will be to relax the present rigid rules and in many of the charges to allow the taxing master a discretion to apportion them according to the nature and importance of the business transacted, to the skill and labour bestowed upon it, and to the responsibility attached to it. It may be right for us to mention that of the important changes which have taken place in the taxation of common law costs, those which have been found to answer best are the substitution of discretionary allowances for items which before were fixed."

This rigid and irrational method of computation by fixed scale is the main evil which requires alteration; and the chief practical objection to the rules which forbid a special contract to be entered into for costs, is that they enforce the rigid scale and prevent any resort to a better arrangement. Indeed, as to litigious business, special agreements appear to us to be inappropriate, however convenient they might be found to be in the case of conveyancing.

Lord Westbury's Bill of 1864 proposed to remove the prohibition on making binding agreements for costs, or taking security for future costs, but it did not interfere with the fixed scale; it left the scale untouched, but permitted parties to contract themselves out of it. The present measure, besides legalising agreements and securities, empowers the taxing masters, in language borrowed from 8 & 9 Vict. cc. 119, 124, to have regard not only to the length of documents and the time occupied in rendering services, but to the "skill, labour, and responsibility employed." The bill, therefore, goes to the root of the matter. The eighth clause of the bill forbids solicitors to contract themselves out of their liability for negligence. We do not know that this is a very important matter, especially if on taxation due regard is had to responsibility, but it may be said, that while legalising contracts in general, it was not worth while to make this exception. If a client and his solicitor think it convenient to agree between them that there shall be no penalty recoverable, we do not know why they should be forbidden to do so. It is provided by section 9 that no action or suit is to be brought on any agreement for professional remuneration, but that the agreement may be enforced on motion or petition by "any person, or the representative of any person, a party to the agreement, or being, or alleged to be, liable to pay, or being, or claiming to be, entitled to be paid, the costs, fees, charges or disbursements, in respect of which the agreement is made." This clause needs a little adjustment in order that it may steer clear of what the 5th clause expressly disclaims—interference with third parties. Take the case of a plaintiff who has made a special contract with his solicitor for the conduct of a chancery suit, and suppose that plaintiff gets a decree with costs. According to clause 9, as it now stands, the defendant, being a party liable to pay the costs in respect of which the agreement was made, might petition to have the agreement enforced. He never would do so in practice, because clause 5 very properly prevents the agreement from having any operation at all as regards him; but it will be just as well that clause 9 should receive the necessary verbal amendment. With respect to the clauses which provide for the avoidance of an agreement, the phrase "undue advantage" is certainly wide, but we think that the framers of the bill have done wisely in thus leaving a broad discretion to the Court. In the clause which provides for the re-opening of an agreement after payment, the phrase "special circumstances" has been borrowed from the "taxation after payment" section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. This clause provides for the re-opening of agreements on the application of the client who has paid, upon "special circumstances" being shown. It should be made perfectly clear that after payment an agreement may be re-opened by the solicitor as well as by the client. Otherwise, a client who has taken an "undue advantage" has only to pay promptly the stipulated sum, however inadequate, in order to deprive the solicitor of all redress. Clause 9, had it stood by itself, would, we think, have embraced this requisite, but some doubt is introduced by the addition of clause 11, based upon the "taxation after payment" provision in 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, a provision which, of course, could, in the nature of the case, relate only to applications proceeding from the client's, and not the solicitor's, side.

The provision which empowers solicitors to take security for future costs is just, and in heavy and doubtful cases it will, we think, operate directly in the interests of clients by enabling them to enter into arrangements with reliable advisers upon prudent terms when they must otherwise have gone to mere "speculative" men. It will be found most useful in litigious business, though as to agreements settling merely the amount of remuneration we think them out of place in litigation; nor do we imagine that they will ever become popular. The introduction of the "skill, labour, and responsibility" discretion is the great boon which the measure, if passed, will confer; and, having regard to the bill as a whole, it seems to us very praiseworthy. A good deal has been said in past times upon the merits of an ad valorem method of remuneration, and, undoubtedly, where a miscarriage may saddle the solicitor with damages proportionate to the amount involved, it is just that the remuneration should bear some relation to the amount of this liability. Still no merely ad valorem scale can possibly be sufficient (in conveyancing it would be simply impossible); the elements to be taken into consideration in assessing the reward are well represented by the three terms—skill, labour, and responsibility. All three are concerned and none of them can be dismissed.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

CONSTRUCTIVE TOTAL LOSS—FORM AND TIME OF NOTICE OF ABANDONMENT—DUTY OF MASTER—ADVANCE ON FREIGHT.

Currie v. The Bombay Native Insurance Company, P.O.,
15 W. R. 296.

According to the well-known principle of marine insurance the assured may recover the entire amount insured when there has been either an actual total loss or a constructive total loss. An actual total loss takes place when the thing insured is actually destroyed, as if a ship is burnt or founders at sea. A constructive total loss is where the thing insured is still in existence but is lost to the owners—i.e., where the owners have lost all beneficial interest in it, as where a vessel is captured by an enemy, or has been injured and can be repaired, but only at an expense greater than her value when repaired. In either of these cases the ship is not in fact lost, but yet the owners have lost all benefit from their property in her, and, consequently, are entitled to treat the loss as total, provided they give notice of abandonment—i.e., that they give notice to the insurers that they abandon to them all further interest in the thing insured, and claim the whole of the amount insured.

In Currie v. The Bombay &c. Company the matter in dispute turned very much on the special facts in the case, but the judgment of the Judicial Committee also decided several points of law on the question of constructive total loss. The court decided first as to the form of a notice of abandonment, overruling Parmeter v. Todhunter (1 Camp. 541), that it was not necessary to use the technical word "abandon," but that "any equivalent expressions which informed the underwriters that it was the intention of the assured to give up to them the property insured upon the ground of it having been totally lost must always have been sufficient." In Parmeter v. Todhunter, Lord Ellenborough said, "the abandonment must be express and direct, and I think the word 'abandon' should be used to render it effectual." This case has not been considered as a conclusive authority to the full extent of the decision on this point, but it has hitherto always been referred to and cited in the text-books as if it were a binding authority. It may now be struck out of the list of authorities on this question and Currie v. The Bombay &c. Company, inserted in its place.

The second point was whether the notice of abandonment had been given in reasonable time. This, of course, is a question of fact which must depend upon all the surrounding circumstances. No precise rule can be laid down. The principle is thus stated in the judgment: "The assured is not to delay his notice when a total loss occurs in order to take his chance of doing better for himself by keeping the subject insured, and then when he finds it will be no more to his advantage to do so throwing the burthen on the underwriters, while on the other hand the underwriters cannot complain of a suspension of judgment fairly exercised on the part of the assured to enable him to determine whether the circumstances are such as to entitle him to abandon."

An assured according to this rule is entitled to a reasonable time to ascertain all the facts concerning the injury to the thing insured, but having once ascertained all the facts he must then decide whether he will abandon it. He is not entitled to wait for the purpose of seeing the consequences of anything further which may occur. If he does so wait he loses his right of abandonment, and can claim only for a partial loss.

Another portion of the judgment deals with the duty of the master of a vessel. The Court found as a fact that cargo which had been insured could have been at least partially saved if the ship in which it was loaded had been sacrificed to do so. The ship was then a hopeless wreck, and there was, therefore, "no reason for sparing her, and if the cargo could not have been got out without cutting up the decks, their Lordships think that the captain, who is bound, where there is danger of loss of ship and cargo, to act for the benefit of all concerned, ought to have treated the ship as utterly lost and to have regarded only the interests of the owners of the cargo and of the underwriters." As the cargo might have been thus saved it was not lost by the perils insured against but by the omission of the master, and consequently the underwriters were not liable for a total loss of cargo. It is obvious in a case like this, where the owner of a cargo has suffered loss by the acts or omissions of the master, a further question may arise as to the liability of the master and of his employers for the consequences of the master's acts. No such question, however, is touched upon in the judgment.

There was also a further question as to whether certain advances were advances on freight in which the charterer had an insurable interest. It was held that the charterer had an insurable interest on the authority of the Karnak (17 W. R. 102, and S. J. ante p. 26) where a similar question was decided.

EQUITY.

VESTING ORDER.

Re Cuming, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 157.

No enactments save more time, trouble, and costs than those which enable the Court of Chancery to make vesting orders, or appoint persons to convey. Under the 11 Geo. 4, and 1 Wm. 4, c. 60, the Court could not make such an order unless the rights of the parties had previously been settled by a decree made in a suit, a requirement which in many cases was unnecessary, and made the aid of the statute no boon to those for whom it was intended. The Trustee Act, 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. 60), which repealed the Act above-mentioned, differs from it in that respect, and under the 3rd and 20th sections the Court can make a vesting order, or appoint a person to convey, without a previous decree. Thus in Re Angelo (5 D. G. & Sm. 282), where a debtor in India had pledged bank shares with a creditor in England, giving the creditor a written authority to sell, Vice-Chancellor Parker, observing that the Act of 1850 contained no requirement like that in the former Act, considered that he could treat the debtor as a "trustee" for a purchaser to whom the creditor had sold (the interpretation clause extending the word "trust" to implied and constructive trusts), and could, therefore, make an order vesting the shares in such purchaser.

Section 1 of the Trustee Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 55), enacts that wherever a decree shall have been made for sale of any lands, every person interested being a party to the suit shall be deemed a "trustee" within the meaning of the Trustee Act, 1850; and in Re Carpenter, Kay, 418, Vice-Chancellor Wood said this section showed that in cases as to land it was intended that the constructive trust should first have been declared by decree of the Court. In Re Carpenter the person whose decease had rendered the aid of the Court necessary had verbally contracted to sell certain lands, and the petition sought a declaration that his infant heir was a trustee within the meaning of the Trustee Act, and a vesting order, which declaration and order the Vice-Chancellor declined to make. But in Re Badcock, 2 W. R. 386, where a testator, after devising land to an executor on trust for sale, himself contracted to sell and then died, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley saw no objection to making an order vesting the right to convey in the executor, who desired to carry the contract into effect. And in cases of a compulsory sale to a railway company, the Court will make a vesting order to complete a contract for sale left unfinished at the death of a vendor (Re Russell, 12 Jur. N. S. 524).

It is now ruled that wherever there has been a contract executed by a person now deceased, insane, or absent, the Court will make a vesting order without suit. In Re Carpenter the contract was verbal only. So in Re Collingwood, 6 W. R. 536, where a person went abroad after having by deed covenanted to surrender copyholds and in the meantime to stand seised in trust for the covenantee and his heirs, Vice-Chancellor Wood made a vesting order, treating the case as one of an express trust. The present case was also one of copyholds, but there was only a covenant to surrender, and no covenant to stand seised on trust. The covenantor died without having surrendered, and his heir was of unsound mind. Vice-Chancellor Giffard considered that the distinction was between an executed and an unexecuted contract. In the latter case he said a suit was necessary, but in the former the Court could at once pronounce a vesting order. And so, conversely, in a case of Re Dodd (L.J.G. Jan. 22, 1870), where a testator devised land to trustees for such purposes as A. should appoint, and A. by will directed that the land should be sold and the proceeds equally divided between B., C., and D., of whom D. was of unsound mind, the trustees of the will of the original testator (who were also those of the will of A.) having, with the approbation of B. and C., entered into a contract for the sale of the land, Lord Justice Giffard said that the contract could only be carried into effect under a decree. Here there was no contract at all, and the Court would require a decree to ensure that the sale was a proper one in the interests of D.

COMMON LAW.

CONSIDERATION FOR CONTRACT—FORBEARANCE TO SUE.

Coles v. Paek, C.P., 18 W. R. 292.

The point actually decided in this case was that a particular guarantee was a continuing one, and not merely a guarantee for a sum of money due when it was given. As further advances were made, no question arose as to the consideration for the guarantee, such further advances being by themselves a sufficient consideration. If, however, it had been held that the guarantee was not a continuing one, then it would have been necessary to prove some other consideration. The consideration was thus stated in the guarantee:—"I do hereby, in consideration of your forbearing to take immediate steps for the recovery of" a certain sum of money, guarantee, &c. The question might have arisen whether a promise like this to forbear to sue without mentioning any fixed time for such forbearance would be a good consideration. The point was touched upon in argument but was not decided, as, under the circumstances, it became unnecessary to consider it.

The two most important cases on this question of forbearance to sue are Simple v. Pink (1 Ex. 74) and Oldershaw v. King (27 L. J. Ex. 120). In Simple v. Pink the declaration alleged that in consideration that the plaintiff would forbear to sue the maker of a promissory note for a reasonable time, the defendant guaranteed, &c. It was held that this declaration was not proved by evidence of a guarantee in consideration of the plaintiff forbearing to sue without the mention of any time for such forbearance. It was argued that a promise to forbear to sue was like a promise to make out a title to land, and that where no time was mentioned the law would imply that a reasonable time was meant, and that the question of reasonableness was one of fact for the jury. Alderson, B., however, said: "Making out a title is an act which necessarily requires some time, but suppose in this case the plaintiff had brought his action the next minute, would that be a forbearance? In a case like the present what definite idea can you attach to forbearance for a reasonable time?" The meaning may depend upon the character of the party, whether he is litigious, or whether he is mild and somnolent. It will be found that the cases in which the law implies a reasonable time are those in which the particular Act requires some time to do it."

In Oldershaw v. King this point was again discussed but not decided. There are, however, some important dicta in that case which show that the decision in Semple v. Pink cannot be accepted as settled law. Cockburn, C.J., Erle, Crompton, and Willes, J.J., all expressed an opinion opposed to the principle of Semple v. Pink.

The real difficulty in this point is that stated by Alderson, B., in Semple v. Pink, that the question of reasonableness is much more indefinite in this than in almost any other case of the kind. Where a title has to be made out, or goods delivered, or a journey made, the commencement of the inquiry as to the reasonableness of the time must be as to the ordinary time necessary for doing the particular act, and the ordinary time under special circumstances may or may not be reasonable. But in the case of a promise not to sue the only question is as to the surrounding circumstances, and there is as it were no starting point from which to commence the inquiry. Notwithstanding these difficulties the dicta in Oldershaw v. King show that Semple v. Pink must now be looked on as a very doubtful authority.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DEL CREDERE COMMISSION—RIGHT TO SUE.

Bramble v. Spiller, C. P. 18 W. R. 316.

When a contract is made through an agent the rights of all parties are precisely the same as if the contract had been made directly between the principals, provided that it is known at the time of the contract that the agent is contracting not for himself, but merely as agent for known principals. In these cases the agent is merely the hand by which the contract is completed. When the agent contracts as principal without disclosing the fact that he is an agent, he is liable as principal to the other party, because it would be unreasonable that after a person had entered into a contract as principal he should be able to transfer his liability under it to the real principal of whom the other party to the contract knew nothing, and with whom he might not, perhaps, have wished to contract. The principal is liable when it is discovered that the contract was made for him, but the agent is also liable, and the other contracting party has the option of suing either the agent or the principal at his pleasure. The same result also follows when an agent signs a written contract without specifying that he is agent. Verbal evidence is not admissible to show that the agent did really contract as agent only and for a principal known at the time to the other party.

In Bramble v. Spiller, it was argued that these rules do not apply to a del credere agent in the same way that they apply to an ordinary agent. There was a contract in this case between the defendant and the plaintiffs' principals. The contract was made by the plaintiffs, who acted under a del credere commission. The bought and sold notes stated the contract to be between the defendant and the plaintiffs' principals. The plaintiffs sued upon the contract, and contended that as del credere agents, they had sufficient interest in it to sue, although it was not made in their names. It was decided, however, that their position, so far as their right to sue was concerned, was the same as that of any other agents, and having been non-suited at the trial, the non-suit was upheld. This decision follows the rule laid down in Hornby v. Lacy (6 M. & S. 171), that a "del credere commission imports that if the vendee does not pay, the factor (the del credere agent) will; it is a guarantee from the factor to the principal against any mischief to arise from the vendee's insolvency. But it varies not an iota the rights subsisting between vendor and vendee."

In Atkins v. Amber (2 Esp. 493), on facts very similar to those in Bramble v. Spiller, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to a verdict; Eyre, C.J., saying, "It is proved that the plaintiffs had at least a special property in the goods sold; the sale was, therefore, theirs, and I am of opinion that it is not a variance;" that the written contract of sale is expressed to be between the defendant and the plaintiffs' principals. Atkins v. Amber is now, however, overruled by Hornby v. Lacy and other cases which have been followed in Bramble v. Spiller.

PROBATE.

VERBAL EVIDENCE—CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—"NEPHEW."

Grant v. Grant, Prob., 18 W. R. 230.

In order to carry out the provisions of any written instrument, whether deed, simple contract, will, or other document, it is always necessary (as a matter of fact and not of law) to resort to verbal evidence in order to identify the things and persons mentioned in the instrument. No description, however elaborate, can possibly obviate this necessity. To this extent therefore all writings have to be supplemented by verbal evidence. When any particular person or thing is properly and fully described in a document, it cannot, as a general rule (although this is subject to exception), be shown that some other person or thing to whom the description does not in terms apply is the real object of the description. If a description applies equally to any one of two or more objects, verbal evidence is always admissible to show to which the description was in fact intended to apply. These rules govern all writings, wills as well as other documents. In Grant v. Grant these rules had to be applied by the Court of Probate in the case of a will which left a legacy to, and appointed as executor, "my nephew Joseph Grant." At the testator's death there were two Joseph Grants. One was the son of a brother of the testator, and the other a nephew of the testator's wife. There was ample evidence to show beyond doubt that in fact the testator meant by the words "my nephew" his wife's nephew. The question was whether this evidence was admissible. It was argued against its admission that "nephew" has a known and well-ascertained meaning, and that although it might be used so as to include a wife's nephew, still that its primary signification was the son of a brother or sister, that there was nothing in the will to show that the testator did not use the word in its primary meaning, and the word in this sense applied accurately to Joseph the testator's nephew.

Lord Penzance, however, admitted the evidence, and therefore declared that the wife's nephew was the person designated by the words "my nephew." The evidence was admitted on the principle that such evidence is always admissible to show that a particular word has a popular and unusual meaning in particular localities or trades, and that such evidence ought also to be admitted when a word has a popular as distinguished from its strict legal or etymological meaning throughout the whole country. Lord Penzance says, "It may be that the word 'nephew,' when used as the sole description of a class who are to take a benefit under a will must be construed to include only sons of brothers or sisters of the testator . . . but this does not appear to me to preclude a wider signification being attached to the word when used as an additional description of a person specified by name, to whom the word is in an ordinary and popular sense applicable."

It was clear that this evidence must have been admitted if the description had only been by name, "Joseph Grant," and the decision is that the addition of the further description of "nephew," which in one sense was, and in another was not, erroneous, did not prevent such admission. The principle of the decision shows that it would be more correct to say that words in wills and other documents are to be construed in their "ordinary" than in their "primary" signification. The primary meaning of a word may be very different from that in which it is ordinarily used.

When we have quoted the comprehensive title of this Directory, and stated that each department is presented accurately, exhaustively, and with a handy arrangement, we have said enough to recommend it. On all the principal subjects of finance, commerce, the legislature and executive, public offices, banks, companies, the colonies, foreign countries, the army and navy, &c., &c., the information here supplied comprehends England equally with Ireland—the United Kingdom in fact. The Directory also contains a quantity of special Irish information. It is a very useful and reliable work for reference.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Feb. 25.—Re Fitch.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 125—Rule 260—Injunction to restrain proceedings—Receiver.

Brought applied under this petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition, for the appointment of a receiver, and also for an interim injunction restraining a creditor at whose suit an execution had been levied upon the debtor's effects, from proceeding to a sale.

The affidavit filed in support of the application showed that the debtor, who was a furniture dealer, filed his petition, under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, on the 23rd inst. The sheriff had previously (on the 16th inst.) levied an execution upon the debtor's effects for a sum of £39 balance of judgment debt and costs due to a creditor named Crossley. The stock-in-trade was valued at £200, and the debtor swore that, if the sheriff sold, it would not, in all probability, realise more than £100; and that it would conduce to the interest of the general body of the creditors that the particular creditor should be restrained from proceeding to a sale, and that a receiver should be appointed.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—Have you an affidavit of fitness in regard to the receiver sought to be appointed?

Brought.—No, but he has been nominated by five of the creditors, and the necessary affidavit can be produced at once.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that, upon an affidavit of fitness being filed, the receiver nominated would be appointed, and an interim injunction would be granted restraining the execution creditor from taking further proceedings.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 6 & 125—Declaration of Insolvency—Petition for adjudication—Practice.

In this case, which involved an important point of practice, a petition had been filed by the debtor under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869; and, at a meeting of creditors duly held for the purposes mentioned in the statute, the creditors resolved that the affairs of the debtor should be liquidated in bankruptcy. Afterwards a petition for adjudication was presented by a creditor under section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, wherein the grounds upon which the adjudication was sought were set forth, and, in particular, the declaration of insolvency signed by the debtor on the filing of his petition under the 125th section. Upon the petition coming before the registrar he declined to receive it, by reason, as was understood, of the declaration of insolvency not being in the form prescribed by the 4th sub-division of section 6; and the matter was now mentioned to the court.

Mr. Rooks, solicitor for the petitioning creditor, submitted that the grounds upon which the adjudication was sought were sufficiently set forth in the petition, and that the registrar was bound to receive it.

Sargood, Serjt., said that in the performance of his duty the Chief Registrar had felt bound to decline the petition unless the Act ordered him to accept it. He submitted that a clear distinction existed between the declaration of insolvency in the form prescribed by section 6, and the admission by the debtor on the face of the petition under section 125; for the latter was not in fact a declaration of insolvency, and the presentation of a petition for liquidation did not constitute an act of bankruptcy. The creditors moreover had no statutory right to pass a fancy resolution of their own, and if the filing a petition under section 125 constituted an act of bankruptcy, any dissatisfied creditor might file a petition within six months and enormous difficulties would arise. He referred to the 1st and 106th forms given in the rules and to the 12th sub-division of the 125th section.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the petition in this case had not been prepared without the matter having been duly considered. The 6th section enumerated certain acts of bankruptcy, but the Court had power on other grounds to adjudicate. In this case a petition had been duly presented for a liquidation, and the creditors had rejected it at the meeting, in which case the rules clearly and distinctly provided that the Court had power to adjudge the debtor a bankrupt. [His Lordship read the 266th and 267th rules.] The Act of Parliament and the rules must be read together. The adjudication could only properly be made by means of a petition, and the Court should be apprised of the steps which had taken place under the liquidation by the allegations in that petition. Although the declaration of the insolvency was not in the form prescribed by section 6, it was clearly an act of bankruptcy upon which an adjudication could be founded; and his Lordship thought the petition was in proper form, though, if the grounds upon which the creditor desired to adjudicate had not been sufficiently stated, it would have been different. The order would be therefore that the petition be filed, and that the proceedings go on in the manner directed by the rules. His Lordship did not find any fault with the Chief Registrar in bringing the motion before him; that officer had certain duties to fulfil, and it was right that he should be jealous as to the mode in which they were performed.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, rule 49—Commission to examine witnesses—Practice.

R. Griffiths applied, under the 49th of the new rules, for a commission to examine two witnesses, one resident in Dorsetshire and the other in Shropshire. A petition for adjudication in bankruptcy had been filed against a debtor, and it was necessary that the witnesses should be examined. The affidavit in support of the application showed that the witnesses were unable, through infirmity, to attend the court in London.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that the application was quite reasonable under the circumstances, and a request would be made to the county court judge to take the evidence. His Lordship hoped that care would be taken in drawing up the necessary forms, regard being had to former precedents.

Bankruptcy Act 1869, rule 260.

Mr. Scaife, solicitor, applied for an interim injunction to restrain a person named Kent from proceeding further in an action brought against the debtor, and in which he would soon be in a position to sign judgment.

It appeared that on the 25th ult., the debtor filed a petition for liquidation by an arrangement on composition under section 125 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. An action had been brought by Kent under the Bills of Exchange Act, and the debtor alleged that it was desirable that his property should be protected until after the appointment of a trustee.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that a receiver must be appointed before any order for an injunction could be made.

Mr. Scaife said he was not aware that the appointment of a receiver was indispensable.

The CHIEF JUDGE said it was so, otherwise the property would be left in the sole disposition and control of the debtor, and he might get rid of it before the appointment of a trustee. Some proper person must be named as receiver, and the registrar must be satisfied as to his fitness; there was not generally much difficulty as to the appointment of a receiver.

March 2.—Re Fitch.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, rule 260.

Brough applied for and obtained an order under rule 260 restraining an execution creditor and the sheriff from proceeding to a sale of the effects of the debtor, a furniture dealer. The application was opposed on behalf of the execution creditor, but—

The CHIEF JUDGE said that, a receiver having been appointed, it was only right that an order should be granted, so that one creditor might not obtain a preference over the rest.

COUNTY COURTS.

EXETER.

(Before the Registrar, Mr. R. R. M. Daw).

Feb. 18.—Re Risdon.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, section 91—Held, not to be retrospective.
First meeting of creditors.

Mr. Hirtzel and Mr. Payne (of Tiverton) for the estate, and Mr. Floud for creditors.

On the proofs being tendered, Mr. Hirtzel tendered a proof on behalf of the trustees under a marriage settlement.

Mr. Floud objected to this proof on the ground that under the 91st section of the present act the trustees could not prove.

The facts were as follows:—The bankrupt married in October, 1862, and by a settlement made previous to marriage, and in consideration of the fortune he would have with his intended wife, he agreed to settle £1,000 upon her, to be secured by a bond given to the trustees. The bankrupt, Thomas Risdon, was to retain the £1,000 as long as the wife should consent thereto, and until she should give a written notice to the trustees requiring them to call in the money. The proceeds of the property were to be paid to Thomas Risdon. At the date of the settlement certain freehold ground rents belonging to the wife were transferred to the husband, and have since been sold by him for £400. On the 25th January last the trustees served Thomas Risdon with a notice to pay over the £1,000 on the bond; on 2nd February Thomas Risdon was declared bankrupt. The question was now whether the trustees under the settlement can vote in the choice of a trustee under the bankruptcy. There was no doubt they could do so under the old Bankruptcy Act, but the 91st section of the Act of 1869 declared that any covenant or contract made by a trader for the future settlement of money upon his wife or children should be void as against a trustee under a bankruptcy, and the question therefore arose whether that section included settlements made before the 1st of January, 1870.

The REGISTRAR decided (and this opinion was supported by Mr. Serjt. Petersdorff) that the point involved was one of general application, not depending upon special facts, but upon the broad question whether the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 was to be construed as having a retrospective operation. The rule of law as to the interpretation of statutes was clear and indisputable—that in the absence of expressive and unambiguous words legislative enactments could not affect contracts or transactions valid at the time they took place. The law then existing must be the test of the validity—(see Petersdorff's Abridgement, 6, p. 485). Even if there had been any equivocal words in the Bankruptcy Act, all doubt would be dispelled by the comprehensive provision in 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83, s. 20, that none of the rights or liabilities created under the prior Acts should be affected or rendered invalid by the repeal of the Act of 1861, or affect any past operations. Section 91 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, did not therefore include settlements made before the 1st January, 1870, but only those made after that date. The trustees therefore were legal creditors, and entitled to prove.

The case had been submitted to Mr. De Gex, Q.C., who said he was of opinion that where an enactment took away rights it was not to be construed as retrospective, unless there were express words to that effect (vide Moon v.

Durden, 2 Ex. 28, Kimbray v. Draper, L. R. 3 Q. B. 161, 16 W. R. 539). He did not find any words in the 91st section or elsewhere in the Act making that section retrospective. He was of opinion that it was not so, and did not affect settlements made before the passing of the Act.

The REGISTRAR therefore decided to admit the proof.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. LEWIS PRICE DELVES BROUGHTON, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Registrar of the Archdeaconry of Calcutta, from the 1st January. Mr. Broughton was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in April, 1860, and soon after commenced practice in the High Court of Calcutta. He was afterwards appointed Recorder of Rangoon, in British Burmah, but resigned that office last year, when Mr. Francis Housman was nominated to succeed him.

MR. FREDERICK DUNDAS CHAUNTRELL, solicitor, of Bombay, has been appointed Government Solicitor at Calcutta. This gentleman is better known as Mr. Faithfull, having only assumed the name of Chauntrell within the last three years. He is a son of the Rev. Ferdinand Faithfull, rector of Headley, in Surrey, and a brother of Miss Emily Faithfull, well-known for her establishment of the Victoria Press for the employment of women as printers. Mr. Faithfull proceeded to Bombay about fifteen years ago, and became a partner with Mr. Charles Pollock, who held the office of Clerk of the Crown at Bombay. After practising as an attorney for some years, he was appointed a judge of the Small Cause Court at Belgaum, being afterwards transferred to Ahmednuggur, and then to Bombay. On the arrival of Sir Charles Jackson as President of the Commission sent out to inquire into the circumstances attending the failure of the Bank of Bombay, Mr. Faithfull (who had then changed his name) was selected to be secretary of the Commission, and came to England in this capacity, the Commission being engaged for some months at the India Office in examining witnesses in England. This, of course, brought him into notice at the India Office, and doubtless led to his selection to fill the post of Government Solicitor at Calcutta.

MR. JOHN MARRIOTT DAVENPORT, solicitor, of Oxford, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Oxfordshire for the present year. Mr. Davenport was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1830, and fills the offices of clerk of the peace for the county, district registrar of the Court of Probate, and deputy-registrar of the diocese of Oxford. He has served as Under-sheriff for many years past.

MR. ACTON TINDAL, solicitor, of Aylesbury, has been appointed Under-sheriff of the county of Bucks, for the current year. Mr. Tindal, who was certificated in Trinity Term, 1834, is also Clerk of the Peace for the county, registrar of the Court of the Archdeacon and Commissary of Buckingham, and Clerk to the Magistrates for the Three Hundreds of Aylesbury.

MR. CHARLES WILLIAM POTTS, of Chester, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Cheshire for the present year. Mr. Potts was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1837, and is Clerk of the Peace for Cheshire.

MR. HENRY MOUNTRICH JAMES, solicitor, of Exeter, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Devonshire for the present year. Mr. James was certificated in Easter Term, 1848.

MR. SILAS GEORGE SAUL, solicitor, of Carlisle, has been appointed Under-sheriff of Cumberland for the present year. Mr. Saul was certificated in Hilary Term, 1859.

MR. THOMAS MORGAN GEPP, solicitor, of Chelmsford, has been appointed Under-sheriff of the county of Essex for the present year. Mr. Gepp was certificated in Hilary Term, 1830, and holds numerous local offices at Chelmsford.

MR. HENRY CHILD BEDDOE, attorney, of Hereford, has been appointed Under-sheriff of the county for the current year. Mr. Beddoe is certificate as an attorney was issued in Hilary Term, 1847, and he is solicitor and steward to the Bishop of Hereford.

MR. THOMAS JAMES HOOPER, solicitor, of Biggleswade, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Bedfordshire for the present year. Mr. Hooper was certificated in Trinity Term, 1855, and is Registrar of the Biggleswade County Court.

MR. WILLIAM FRANK BLANDY, solicitor, of Reading, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Berkshire for the present year. Mr. Blandy was certificated in Michaelmas Term, 1851.

Mr. FREDERICK TUCKER ASTON, of Commercial Sale Rooms, Mincing-lane, has been appointed a London Commissioner for Administering Oaths in Common Law, and a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the county of Middlesex, also in and for the City of London, and the city and liberties of Westminster, and also in and for the county of Surrey.

Mr. ROLAND TAYLOR, of Bolton-le-Moors, Lancaster, has been appointed a Commissioner to Administer Oaths in Chancery.

Mr. DAVID WOOLF, of King-street, Cheapside, has been appointed a London Commissioner for Administering Oaths in Common Law.

Mr. GEORGE HENRY HOLT, of Horbury, York, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the West Riding of the county of York.

Mr. ARTHUR WELLS, of Nottingham, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the town and county of the town of Nottingham, also in and for the county of Nottingham.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

APPEALS FROM THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—In their 23rd query the Judicature Commissioners ask, "to what cause should the small number of appeals from the county courts be attributed?" and I wish I could honestly answer that question in the complacent language of one of my learned brethren, who does not hesitate to attribute it "to the fact, that, as an all but universal rule, the decisions are satisfactory." For my own part at least I feel that this testimony—to use the mildest phrase—is a little too favourable, and I certainly ascribe the paucity of appeals to very different causes from that on which the judge, whose sentiments I have just quoted, seems exclusively to rely. To my mind it arises in great measure from the absence of technical pleading, and from the infrequency of trial by jury. Where pleadings—as in the county courts—are perfectly simple, and are moreover open to almost any extent of amendment, questions of law can scarcely be raised upon them; and when jurors are not summoned, there can be no misdirection, and but little opportunity for any serious dispute respecting the admission or rejection of evidence. Again, when a judge is not fettered by the presence of a jury, he can always, in the event of a legal difficulty springing up, adjourn the cause so as to enable him to look carefully into the authorities before he pronounces judgment; and this, of course, gives him a great advantage over any other judge—however superior as a lawyer the latter may be—who is required off-hand to unravel a knotty point of law. A judge, too, who has to decide both law and fact can often, if he feels himself weak, avoid any hazard of an appeal by acting on the shrewd advice of Lord Mansfield to the youthful justice of the peace—"Give the best decision you can, but spare your reasons. The decision will probably be right. The reasons are sure to be wrong." Self-confident judges may spurn this prudent counsel, and like to "air their law" whenever they have the chance; but even these gentlemen run far less risk of an appeal than might be expected; for, as a blot is not a blot till it is hit, their errors, if they commit any, may readily escape detection, the ignorance of the judge being protected by the greater ignorance of his audience. Two other causes may be mentioned, each of which has a powerful effect in keeping down the number of appeals. The one is, that in a large majority of county court plaints no dispute in point of law can by any contrivance arise, the only questions being whether a debt is due, what is its amount, and how it can be paid. The other is, that the matter in issue involves generally so small an amount as to hold out little inducement for protracted litigation. A suitor may be grievously dissatisfied with the result of a trial in a county court, and may even feel tolerably certain that the decision is wrong; but still, his first experience of the uncertainty of the law will not encourage him to try his luck again, and a night's reflection will tame his litigious ardour, and "make him rather bear the ills he has than fly to others that he knows not of."

Taking all these causes into consideration, and ascribing to each its fair weight, the almost invariable finality of county court judgments ought not to be a matter of surprise, and one is quite prepared for the statement that, last year, out of 11,194 common law plaints for sums exceeding £20, there were but sixteen appeals, while only six appeals resulted from 679 equity suits. I have not here taken into account the 964,146 plaints which were entered for sums not exceeding £20; because, although the Act of 1867 has, for the first time, allowed an appeal in such actions "with the leave of the judge," I believe that that enactment is wholly inoperative, partly, in consequence of the suitors being generally ignorant of its existence, but principally, for the good reason that no provision has yet been made for recovering the costs of such procedure. To decide against a man, and then calmly tell him that, if he chooses to give security for his opponent's costs, he may, at his own expense, prosecute an appeal from the decision, seems to me to savour of mockery; yet this is the measure of justice which has been meted out by the learned draftsmen who have framed "the scale of costs" under section 15 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142. When the Commissioners therefore ask, as they do in their 23rd query, "whether the present system of appeal is efficient," I have no hesitation in saying that, so far as the Act of 1867 is concerned, it is the very reverse, and that no time should be lost in carrying out the intention of the Legislature as expressed in sections 13 and 15 of that statute.

Nor is this all; for whether we regard the conflicting enactments and rules which have been promulgated with respect to appeals as they relate to common law, equity, or admiralty proceedings, or examine the different "scales of costs on appeal" which have been sanctioned by authority, we are lost in astonishment at the strange inconsistencies which meet us in all directions. The limited space of a letter will only allow me to deal with these matters "by sample," but the instances I shall give will, I trust, be sufficient to indicate what may be discovered on a careful inspection of "the bulk." And, first, as to the right of appeal. This, at common law, unless with the special sanction of the judge, is limited to cases where the sum in dispute exceeds £20, while in admiralty causes the limit is fixed at £50, and in equity no limit whatever is recognised. Then the notice of appeal must, at common law, be given within ten days after the trial, but in equity thirty days are allowed, while in admiralty proceedings notice is not required at all, but the actual "instrument of appeal" must be lodged in the Registry of the Court of Admiralty within ten days from the date of the decree or order. Again, the appellant must in all cases give security for costs, but in equity the amount is fixed at £10; at common law it is such a sum as the registrar shall approve; and in maritime suits the security that will suffice is left quite uncertain. Then, at common law, the appellant may exercise the very questionable right of selecting his own court of appeal, while in equity the appeal must be heard before the particular vice-chancellor appointed for that purpose. Moreover, different rules prevail with respect to the time of presenting the case, the necessity for the judge signing it whether he approves of it or not, the mode of transmitting it to the court of appeal, and, indeed, with respect to every stage of the proceeding. Such are some of the anomalies which will at once be apparent if we compare on the one hand the Act of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, ss. 14, 15, and the common law rules of 1867 numbered from 186 to 197, and on the other the Acts of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 18, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, ss. 26—31, together with Order xix, of 1867.

An examination of the different "scales of costs on appeal," will be equally unsatisfactory; for not only do they differ substantially from each other, as they respectively apply to equity and common law, but they are in themselves essentially absurd. Let us just imagine rules which, in a simple matter of appeal give, at common law ten, and, in equity, eight separate stages at which costs may be demanded by the appellant's attorney, and this too, when the whole amount which he can receive ranges from two and a-half to three and a-half guineas. Let us further imagine rules which, being thus minute in defining and sub-dividing the appellant's costs, are wholly oblivious of any charges to which the respondent may be entitled. If we bear all this in mind we can form a tolerable estimate with respect to the inefficiency of our present system of appeal, and that without at all calling in aid the somewhat crude suggestions contained in the eight questions of the Judicature Commissioners, which immediately follow the twenty-third. Without citing those questions at length, I may be permitted to state emphatically, that I utterly disapprove of any appeal on matters of fact, or on interlocutory proceedings, and that, in my judgment, any attempt to substitute the judge's notes for the special case, or to empower the judge to reserve questions for the opinion of a superior court, would be extremely mischievous. I am anxious that the practice relating to appeals should be made sensible, and uniform, and efficient, but I am not anxious that too great facilities should be afforded for appealing. The old maxim, "Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium," may be bad Latin, but it is excellent sense.

A METROPOLITAN COUNTY COURT JUDGE.

COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—I beg to give your readers the following statement of facts:—

In December last some clients of mine issued a plaint under section 2 of the County Courts Act, 1867, for a debt of £17, the fee on which was £1 2s. The defendants were a company. No. 58 of County Court Rules points out the method in which service is to be effected. The summons is to be delivered to a secretary of the company at the registered office of the company.

The summons was sent to the bailiff of a foreign county court for service, and an affidavit was sent up that he had duly served the summons by delivering the same to the defendants' manager, Mr. —, personally.

The registrar sent a notice to the plaintiffs in pursuance of the Act, stating that the defendants had been served, and had not given notice of their intention to defend.

On the return day the plaintiffs sent to the court and asked if they were entitled to judgment and execution. They were told "Yes; the further fees will be £2 12s." The fees were paid, and the execution was levied in the country, and at once paid out, and the money paid into court. The defendants then applied that the judgment might be set aside and a new trial had, on the ground that the defendants knew nothing of the matter until the execution was levied. Three days' notice of the application was given. On receipt of the notice from my clients I went to the office of the county court, and pointed out that the Rules required seven days' notice, but was told that if I did not attend the application would be granted, that being the practice.

On the making of the application I attended the Court and asked for an adjournment, that I might make inquiries in the country, and I pointed out to the judge the rule under which I was entitled to seven days' notice. His reply was, "I will adjourn it at your expense." The application was then preceded with, and the defendants produced evidence clearly showing that the defendants were never served at all, and that the person alleged in the affidavit of service to be their manager was not their manager. It was also stated that the bailiff, instead of serving the summons at the office of the company, had given it to the person he chose to call the manager in the office of the county court. Upon that evidence the judge set the judgment aside, ordered the money paid into court to be paid out to the defendants, and ordered plaintiffs to pay the costs of the application, which were over £6, stating in reply to my remonstrance that the judgment was entirely the act of the Court—"You have proceeded on an insufficient affidavit, and must take the consequences."

I subsequently applied to the judge under the County Court Rules for an order directing the bailiff to pay the plaintiffs the costs they had incurred through his default—viz., the £2 12s. and the £6 odd.

The judge, on my showing him the Rules giving him the authority, declined to make the order, saying "You have improperly obtained a judgment, and now you ask me to make an order on this man in his absence. Such a rule ought never to have been made, and it shows great want of caution on the framers of the Rules."

Such, Sir, is a plain statement of the facts of this case.

The plaintiffs are obliged by the law to rely on officials. The officials are well paid and practically irresponsible, for it is not worth while to sue one official in the court of another, and throw good money after bad. The out-of-pocket costs of obtaining a judgment and execution in the superior courts are about £1, and the plaintiffs have the advantage of legal assistance, and have their remedy against their attorneys for negligence. The attorney would search for appearance or the defendant must give notice of it, and there could not be such a miscarriage as that I have described.

It seems, therefore, to my humble judgment that county court law is three times as expensive as and much worse than any other.

I may mention that the costs allowed to me as against the defendants, supposing the proceedings to have been successful, would have been 11s. 8d. But, irrespective of the question of costs, surely something ought to be done to enable the suitors to look after their own business, or employ some one whom they can trust to attend to it for them.

A SOLICITOR WHO HAS PRACTISED IN THE COUNTY COURT FOR THE LAST TIME.

ASSURANCE COMPANIES AND THEIR AMALGAMATIONS.

Sir,—In answer to the observations of "A Barrister" contained in your number of the 5th February I submit the following remarks:—

Your correspondent seems to think that he has discovered a technical point, by which shareholders of amalgamated companies may get released from their engagements with their policyholders, and throw upon them the loss occasioned by the insolvency of the liquidator selected by themselves, without consulting their policyholders. I think, however, it is clear, from the reasons given in the able judgments of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Justice Giffard, and the Vice-Chancellor James, in the matter of the Family Endowment Society, that they will not succeed in this, for, although these judgments only refer to the case of an annuitant who had received money from the amalgamating company, it is quite plain to any legal mind that the reasons equally apply to the policyholders who have paid premiums to that company in respect of the policies of the Family Endowment Society where no new contract has been entered into, and that the mere payment of the premium to the amalgamating company by the direction of the amalgamated company, cannot be treated as an acceptance of the security of one company in lieu of that of the other. The Lord Chancellor observed "that which is to be proved is that a creditor having an instrument upon which he can rely as creating a right of suit against all the assets of the society with which he deals, including all the unpaid calls for which the proprietors are liable, has abandoned that definite claim for a claim upon the assets of a company with which he has no direct contract, including the liability, if any, of the shareholders in that company for calls." And further, "that there would be nothing necessarily inconsistent with the union of the society and the company that the company should keep the assets (amongst which, of course, are the premiums accruing due upon policies) distinct from their own, and should, as agents of the society, make out of such assets all the payments to which they were liable, and which might not otherwise be provided for by the acceptance, on the part of the creditor, of a substituted policy or grant, whatever the arrangements might be as to the balance": 18 W. R. 268. "A Barrister" says that prudent policyholders might have insisted on taking their receipts in the name of the original insurers. If this means, get the signature of the amalgamated company, this was simply impracticable; but what better receipt can they have than the receipt for the premium paid in respect of a policy of the amalgamated company?—which must be the form of a receipt if a new policy has not been granted, and from which it cannot be inferred that by taking such receipt the policyholder has abandoned the policy to which it refers. It would, of course, have been easy for either the dissolved or the amalgamating company, as the Lord Chancellor observes "to have stated the terms upon which the premium was received;" but this would not have been suitable to the tactics of either company, for in such case their arrangements would probably have been disturbed by legal proceedings. Their scheme, of course, was to let matters go on quietly, leaving the policyholders to believe that their rights were not to be disturbed. In the case of the Family Endowment Society, the name of that society was actually added to the name of the Albert Company, until several premiums had been paid to the company. Supposing then that the company had made to the policyholders of the society the proposal which they now seek to say that they accepted without knowing what it was—that is to say in so many words, that a subscribed capital of £500,000 of a society composed of wealthy men (of which £20,000 only had been paid up), whose liabilities were limited, in consequence of its having ceased to carry on business, should be given up, and in lieu of it the security of a company taken whose subscribed capital was only £500,000, a large portion of which had been paid up, with liabilities of its own and of more than twenty amalgamated companies, to meet the liabilities of which the capital probably of ten millions was originally provided—does "A Barrister" think that any man in his senses would have accepted, without any consideration, such a proposal? Yet this is the arrangement which it is sought to enforce upon the policyholders, by inference, without knowing what it was, and without having given them the option of paying the premiums on their policies, in any other way than to the amalgamating company.

Now, Sir, let us come to the new point raised by "A Barrister," which is to have the effect of releasing the shareholders of the amalgamated company from their written contract. Your correspondent says that if the arrangement is ultra vires it is simply void, and consequently that all arrangements founded upon it are equally void; but he does not touch the question whether the arrangement be ultra vires of both companies or ultra vires of the amalgamating company—in which case he would have to maintain that the contracting company is able to get rid of its contract by giving its contract by giving to its policyholders a piece of waste parchment in lieu of their policies. Let us however take the point as he raises it and apply the facts. The deed of settlement, he is aware, is binding not only as between the shareholders themselves, but also as between the policyholders and the shareholders, for their policies refer to it. This deed contains clauses by which, when the company is dissolved, proper arrangements are to be made for meeting its outstanding liabilities, and for receiving its assets, among which are the premiums on the policies. Moreover, the policies themselves impose an obligation on the society to provide for the receipt of the premiums payable under it when due; then, if the arrangement with the amalgamated society be ultra vires, the shareholders who assented to the arrangement have been parties to a breach of contract by the society of which they were members, by shutting up their office without fixing any place for premiums being received, as well as to a direct legal fraud upon their policyholders, whereby the assets which ought to have been set apart to meet their claims have been misappropriated. After they have done this, is the society, having broken its contract, to be allowed to turn round upon its policyholders and tell them that they have broken their contracts by not doing that which the society has not afforded them the means of doing? It is not even open to "A Barrister" to say that this is not the act of the society, for it was the duty of the society to have appointed a place for receiving premiums, which (assuming the arrangement to be ultra vires) it did not do. But, even if this were not so, in almost all cases the body of shareholders were parties to and sanctioned the arrangement; and, in the case of the Family Endowment Society, I believe they all did, for I am told that, out of the moneys which belonged to the policyholders, they paid compensation-moneys and received back

£4 per share, which they had already paid as part of their subscribed capital. A court of equity never could allow a shareholder who had sanctioned such an arrangement to set up such a defense against the payment of a claim of a policyholder.

"A Barrister" admits that it will entail much hardship—and I think he might have added that it would be a gross violation of all legal principle—if a policyholder can be forced to exchange one security for another, without a voice in the matter. But here again he has not well considered the facts; if he had, he would have found that in most cases this is what is really attempted to be done, no option having been given to the policyholder to continue to pay his premiums to the contracting company otherwise than through the medium of the amalgamating company. He says he may, if he pleases, elect to keep his own security by refusing to accept a receipt in the name of the new company. But to whom can he give such a refusal? Not to the contracting company, which has closed its doors. He could not make it to the amalgamated company; because, as he says, the arrangement with that company, was ultra vires. The policyholder does, however, get a receipt for the premium; and such receipt is for the premium due on the policy granted by the contracting company. The Lord Chancellor observes, in the case of the annuitant, the receipt was given by the amalgamating company in respect of the original grant; and asks, Why should the annuitant be led to suppose in thus acting that the new company are not acting as agents for the society? And so, in the case of the policyholder, the receipt being given by the new company for a premium due on the original contract, why should the policyholder be led to suppose that, in thus acting, the company to whom he pays his premiums is not acting as agent for the society, to receive its assets and discharge its liabilities? The next option, says "A Barrister," the policyholder has, is to sue the company with whom he contracted in case of a refusal to accept the premiums; but the same answer applies to this as to the previous option: how is he to get such a refusal, the office of the company being closed? and how is a policyholder, being kept in ignorance of the particulars of the arrangement between the society and the company, to assume, so as to justify him in bringing an action, that the company has not authority to give a proper receipt? The Lord Justice Giffard says:—"It was not incumbent on the creditor to make inquiries as to the terms of the arrangement between the society and the company; the arrangement might well have been, and in the absence of the creditor ought to have been, that the assets of the society should remain liable under the grant. It was incumbent on those who desired that the old contract should be superseded by a new one to make proposals to that effect or take steps for that purpose, but they forbore or neglected so to do." Nothing could have been easier than for the new company to have offered such a receipt, but it did not suit its purpose to do so. Lastly "A Barrister" says that the policyholder could have obtained an injunction; but here again what are the facts? The assets of the old company had been handed over and the whole arrangement completed before the policyholder knew anything at all about the matter; what then becomes of the remedy by injunction?

In conclusion "A Barrister" remarks in a postscript that the point has, since he wrote, been decided by the Vice-Chancellor Malins. I will not venture to discuss what was decided by the Vice-Chancellor, because I have not the facts before me; but of this I am sure that he did not decide that where a receipt, given by the amalgamating company, was given in express terms for a premium due upon a policy of the contracting society, that an inference is to be drawn from the payment of the premium on such a receipt directly the reverse of what the receipt expresses, viz., that the premium is paid in respect of a new contract with the amalgamating company, and an abandonment of the original contract, which the policyholder is still allowed to retain without comment. There was also a further incident in the case before the Vice-Chancellor Malins, namely, that the policyholder had sent his policy to the amalgamating office to have the liability of that company endorsed upon it. There was, therefore, in that case a new contract by the endorsement, from which it might be inferred that the policyholder had accepted the security of the new company in lieu of the old one. There have been some endorsements made upon policies of the Family Endowment Society, but they do not state that the new security was taken in lieu of the old one. If, therefore, the subsequent receipts do not refer to this contract as accepted in lieu of the former contract, it may reasonably be inferred that it was intended that the policyholder should have the security both of the society and of the company, and not be obliged to proceed against the contracting company, leaving that company to recoup itself by means of the indemnity given to it by the other company—an arrangement quite consistent with the amalgamating deed.

MR. LOVESY'S BOOK ON THE NEW BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Sir,—Our attention has been drawn to the letter of "A Solicitor" in your impression of the 19th ult., in which the writer complains of having been misled by the advertisement of Mr. Lovesy's book on the New Bankruptcy Law.

We beg to say, in explanation, that the original advertisements of the work expressly stated that it would contain, as the author intended it should, "so much of the Debtors Act, 1869, as related to bankruptcy," and that the omission of these words in subsequent notifications was an oversight and purely accidental.

To remedy the alleged defect we propose to print copies of the entire Debtors Act, of uniform size with the book, which will be supplied gratis to purchasers, and in all copies issued by us in future, this addition will appear by way of appendix.

We think we are justified in stating that three instances only (including the case of your correspondent) have come to our knowledge in which any objection to the work has been taken upon this ground. KNIGHT & Co.

LEGAL CONFISCATION.

Sir,—I have a still more strange and a real case, than that referred to in your article.

The history of the case is this:—A lease of 11th January, 1711, demised the lands of B. & C. for lives renewable for ever. This lease was turned into a fee farm grant on 30th April, 1852, the rent under it being £25 11s. 7d. Another portion of B. was held under a lease and fee farm grant of a different date subject to a rent of £9 14s. 11d. The two rents were vested in two distinct and separate persons.

A declaration of title was sought for these and other lands, and on the face of the statement of title (which I have seen) it is stated that these lands are held under two fee farm grants and subject to the rents, but strange to say by a declaration of title of 5th April, 1865, it is declared that the owner "is entitled to a fee-simple of the lands of B." and a fee farm rent out of the lands of C., and it makes the lands of C. subject to the two rents of £25 11s. 7d. and £9 14s. 11d., the fact being as before-mentioned that the £9 14s. 11d. was never chargeable on the lands of C. at all, that the owner of the rent had no right of any kind to the lands of C., and that the owner under the grants (of whom my client is assignee) has got the fee-simple of the lands out which the rents were payable.

The fee farm grants by which the rents are reserved contain covenants against alienation.

An action has been brought against my client, and the pleas are, that we have, in fact, got the fee-simple of the lands out of which the rents are payable under the declaration of title.

I think you will agree with me that this is as strange a case as that of a judge granting a conveyance to his son as alluded to in your article. N.

THE "ATROCIOUS TAXES" UNDER SECTION 2 OF COUNTY COURTS ACT, 1867.

Sir,—Your correspondent "A Metropolitan County Court Judge" very properly denounces the taxes levied under the above-quoted Act. I know of no reason why these taxes should be levied at all, but there is, I think, one thing worse than levying taxes improperly, and that is spending them improperly. The section has the effect of relieving registrars of a portion of their labours and transferring it to their clerks; but the "taxes" all (except the bailiff's share) go into the pockets of the registrars. It seems to me to be quite a curiosity of legislation to diminish a registrar's duties and to raise his salary as a compensation.

The whole system of payment by fees is inherently vicious, and the very worst part of the county court organisation. Under it we have a registrar lecturing the suitors court-day after court-day, urging them to take their proceedings under this precious section 2, which means paying extra court-fees to the registrar, and which by process of law are extorted from poor defendants. In the case alluded to by your correspondent, an exact counterpart of more than one I know of myself where the registrar gets about £100 added to his previous £700 per annum, his eight or ten clerks work overtime to earn the £100 without a farthing of remuneration.

These observations of course only apply to courts issuing over 6,000 plaints per annum, where registrars are paid by salary chiefly; but in the smaller courts, where the whole payment is by fees, something even worse goes on. Registrars are known to tout not only for the issue of process under section 2 but also for the ordinary business, because every 25 summonses beyond a certain number adds £4 to the registrar's income. Thus the registrars are directly interested in promoting litigation. The Judicature Commission ought to sweep away the whole of this system of payment of officials by fees. AN OLD HAND.

P.S. The Commission seems to be relying for information upon the superior officials of the courts in written answers to questions; would they not learn a great deal more by a viva voce examination of a few scores of the inferiors on the spot? I know they are only getting part of the truth at present.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Feb. 25.—The Naturalisation Bill was introduced by the Lord Chancellor.

Feb. 28.—The Sunday Trading Bill passed through committee.

March 1.—The Sunday Trading Bill was reported with amendments.

On the Judges' Jurisdiction Bill being reported,

The Lord Chancellor said it had been suggested to him that the consent of the chief judge being now required to the sitting of one of his puisne judges in another court, the letter requesting such assistance should be sent to the chief judge of the court from which assistance was required, instead of to the puisne judge. He would accordingly propose that clause 2 be modified in this sense.

The amendment was agreed to, and the report was then received.

March 3.—The Naturalisation Bill. The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading. He described the bill as carrying out the recommendations of the commission who lately reported.

Lord Westbury said the true principle was this. We ought not to accept a man as a subject by naturalisation unless it had been previously ascertained that the laws of his own country accorded him the necessary permission. Any agreement with regard to nationality could not be produced without a general consensus of European States on the subject. For that agreement we might have some time to wait, but they might depend upon it that until that consent had been obtained the result would be that any attempt to deal with the question would result in aggravating instead of diminishing the existing evils. Evil resulting from a system of double nationality was in truth an evil which they were bound as far as possible to remove, but he doubted whether the bill now under consideration would have that effect. The difficulties connected with the subject were apparent throughout the bill. In the first paragraph, for instance, they would find the system of double nationality. It was limited undoubtedly to British subjects who became naturalised in foreign countries, but we gave what might possibly prove a very large class the privilege of being restored to British nationality, and that without the consent of the country which might have adopted them, and in which they might be naturalised. What it was proposed to do was to tell these persons that they might, if they chose to make a certain declaration, be remitted to their former status, as if it had continued without interruption, with the limitation that within the State where they had been naturalised they should cease to be deemed British subjects unless they had ceased in pursuance of the laws thereof to be the subjects of that State. But if they had chosen to go abroad and be naturalised, why should they be at liberty to drop the status they had acquired without the consent of the country from whom it had been obtained? Again, the 6th section enacted that an alien who obtained a certificate of naturalisation would in the United Kingdom be entitled to all political rights, powers, privileges, and so forth, with the exception that when within the limits of the foreign State of which he was a subject previous to the granting of the certificate, he should not be deemed a British subject unless he had ceased to be a subject of that State in pursuance of the laws thereof. This would leave open a very fruitful source of controversy. A certificate granted under the present system carried no powers beyond the British dominions. The status of a British subject which it conferred dropped from the shoulders of its possessor the moment he quitted our shores, and when abroad he had no claim to be regarded as a British subject at all. That precedent had not been followed in this bill, which, as at present framed, he feared, would give rise to complaints on the part of foreign States.

The Lord Chancellor said the suggestions made should receive every consideration. The matter had, in fact already been under consideration, and the reason why the two years' limit had been imposed was that it was thought there would be something harsh in preventing a man from returning to his original allegiance in case he felt disposed to do so within that time.

The Sunday Trading Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Judges Jurisdiction Bill was read a third time and passed.

Election of Churchwardens.—A bill by Earl Beauchamp to extend the area in small parishes from which churchwardens may be elected, was read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Feb. 22.—Bribery at Beverley.—Mr. Eykyn asked whether the William Henry Cook scheduled as a briber in the report made to the House of Commons by the commissioners to inquire into corrupt practices at Beverley, was the same person as William Henry Cook, Esq., Q.C., now one of the judges of the county court for the county of Norfolk; and, if so, whether he was not, under section 45 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, rendered incapable, as being found guilty of bribery, of holding any judicial office; and, if in the judgment of the Government the statutory incapacity does not attach without further proceedings, it was the intention of the Government to institute such proceedings as might be necessary, in the present state of the law, to subject the person so scheduled to the disqualification imposed in the said Act?

Mr. Bruce said as the evidence on that subject was delivered only that morning the Government had not had an opportunity of considering the matter in order to see how far the description given in the hon. gentleman's question was accurate in its reference to Mr. Cook. But with respect to the application of the Act it appeared extremely doubtful whether the section in question had the force the hon. member supposed.

Visitation Fees.—In reply to Mr. Lopes, Mr. Bruce said the Government had not discovered any fund on which they could charge those fees which had hitherto been recoverable from the churchwardens.

Stamps on Leases.—Mr. Bourke called attention to the alteration made in the administration of the law in respect of stamps upon leases, and asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government intended to propose any remedy for the hardships and anomalies of the existing law? He had received communications from Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, and other large towns, relative to the present condition of the stamp laws, and he did not think the Government, if they intended to introduce a bill on the subject, could object to his bringing forward a motion which really showed the strong necessity for amendment and consolidation. About fifteen years ago an Act was passed which contained certain clauses in regard to the stamp laws. The practice under that Act, taken in connection with other Acts, was to charge an ad valorem stamp, calculated in round money, on every document properly called a lease. The practice was perfectly well known and uniform, sanctioned over and over again by the authorities of Somerset-house in the most formal manner. To use the expression of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the customary interpretation applied to those documents was that ad valorem stamps, and ad valorem stamps alone, were imposed. The authorities at Somerset-house not only applied this customary interpretation to those documents, but they formally adjudicated on the subject. In 1850 an Act was passed which enabled any one having a doubt about the proper stamp to be put on any document to bring it to Somerset-house and obtain the opinion of the Inland Revenue Board on the subject. Some years ago a lease with an ad valorem stamp was taken to the Board of Inland Revenue, and it was decided that that was the proper stamp to be applied to such a document; but in last December a Government notice was issued, requiring in future, in respect to documents of that nature, the additional stamp of £1 15s., besides the ad valorem stamp. A gentleman, who demurred to this new practice, applied to the Court of Exchequer, and that Court decided that the former customary interpretation at Somerset-house was wrong, and that the new interpretation was right. According to this decision there could be no doubt that at least 1,000,000 documents in this country were at the present moment erroneously stamped, were consequently useless for legal purposes in a court of law, and invalid for giving a good title to land. He needed not to enlarge on the dismay which that decision had caused, or on the trouble and expense which must occur if a remedy were not applied. It might be said that everyone was bound to know the law, but if ignorance there were, it was not the ignorance of the suffering public, but of the Government department. He trusted that the Government would prevent a retrospective effect being given to the decision he had referred to, and would introduce a bill providing that the documents in question now improperly stamped ad valorem should be considered valid for all purposes, notwithstanding they did not bear the 35s. stamp. This new tax, which was only imposed last December, was felt as a peculiar hardship in the case of leases of small property, and fell heavily on the whole of the building trade, which was at present in a greatly depressed condition.

Mr. O. Morgan was confident if the letter of the Act were looked at, the reasoning which applied to building leases would be found also to apply to mining and agricultural leases. Every lease contained a covenant, and was made for a valuable consideration, and he believed the result of the decision of the Court of Exchequer would be to invalidate every lease in the country. Who was to bear the expense of setting that right? It was very hard upon a man who bought leases fifteen years ago to find that he could not make them available unless he paid 35s. on each. There were those to whom that sum was a serious consideration, and when you came to multiply it by 50 or 60, you made it a serious matter for another class, while a million times 35s. was a very large sum indeed. He was aware that this was a two-edged argument, and that the grand total would be valuable to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and would enable him to take a penny off the income-tax. If that could be done by fair means he should not object; but this was a case in which the Government and the Legislature were bound to take retrospective action, upon the simple ground that it was the duty of the Legislature to make these fiscal enactments plain, and not leave them to be pitfalls for the unwary. It was not right to allow an accidental slip in an Act of Parliament to be made use of by the Executive, as it might be in a country attorney's office.

Mr. Dodds had received many communications on the subject and was warranted in saying that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer was not acquiesced in by the lawyers of the country generally; there was a strong impression that, if the matter were carried to another court, another decision would be arrived at. In 1845 a decision was given in Nicholls v. Cross, which was similar to Boulton's case. A lease had been granted of a piece of land at a yearly rent of £8; there was a covenant to build a dwelling-house of the value of £150; the lease was stamped with the lease stamp; and the question arose whether, in consideration of the covenant, the lease was not liable to additional duty. The Court of Exchequer held that the lease was sufficiently and properly stamped, and did not require an additional stamp. This remained the law down to the passing of the Act in 1854. It would be contended, of course, that the new Act was framed in terms different from those of the old one; but if it had been intended to make such a change as this the officials of Somerset-house would have taken care that every lease which came before them was impressed with an ad valorem stamp as well as a lease stamp. This Act was somewhat of a penal character, and it ought to be construed strictly in favour of the subject.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that about four years ago the Board of Inland Revenue discovered the mistake they had made, and from that time they had uniformly enforced this thirty-five shilling duty. He made that statement on the authority of the officials of the Board of Inland Revenue. It had been said, with considerable justice and force, that when the body appointed to collect these taxes has held, in the first instance, that only a certain sum of money is due and a certain stamp is required, and has in that way misled the public, it will be hard to interfere and go back and insist upon the proper stamps being affixed. We are bound to obey the law, and if those who are intrusted with the administration of the law misconstrue the law and mislead the public, they are most reasonably called upon to bear the injury inflicted upon them by the mistakes of their officers. Therefore as far as regards what had been done during the time the Board of Inland Revenue misunderstood the law and acted on an erroneous interpretation of it, the Government would not be disposed to enforce either the taxes or the penalty. But it seemed exceedingly difficult to pass a retrospective Act. How could they be at Somerset House enforcing the law, obliging persons to pay the duty, and deciding, as had been repeatedly done for four years, that this 35s. stamp must be affixed, and, in deference to the feelings of hon. members, remitting to other persons the very tax they have been during that time enforcing. This would be an injustice and an unfairness. He was not a Court of Appeal to review the decisions of the Court of Exchequer. But the Court itself seemed to have been satisfied. The Lord Chief Baron was reported to have said that the case was free from doubt, and Mr. Baron Martin, in commenting upon the Act of Parliament, said he should not be at all surprised if it were intended by the Legislature to aim at these very leases. As to the penalties, this being an honest mistake, it would be wrong to enforce them. But in the absence of any authority to the contrary, they must obey the law when once clearly declared, and while foregoing the penalties collect the tax from the period when it had been collected on that principle by the Board of Inland Revenue. At the same time the subject was well worthy of consideration in the future. It would be his duty to call the attention of the House in the course of this session to the whole subject of the stamp laws, and then the House might perhaps be of opinion that this duty was altogether of larger amount than ought to be levied.

Mr. Denman said the decision had taken the whole country and profession by surprise, and the solicitors were completely paralysed by it. Though the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was satisfactory as regarded the future, it was most unsatisfactory as to the intermediate periods, and would leave the practice very vague and uncertain. A lease could not be given in evidence unless the Legislature made it admissible. Was a judge to accept or reject a document which, according to this decision, bore an insufficient stamp? According to law he must reject it. He would apply the test of whether people had notice that the law was to be enforced, but how could any judge decide that a particular deed was stamped with or without notice? It would be impossible for him to enter into such an inquiry; but, on the other hand, it would be most unfair to make any man suffer unless you could bring home to him a knowledge of the decision of the Commissioners four years ago. They had not received any promise from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he would deal with the period down to the four years. (The Chancellor of the Exchequer.—“Yes, I promised to do so.”) That was satisfactory so far, but he did not think the right hon. gentleman could in fairness draw a distinction between the cases before and after the four years.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the intention was this:—For the period during which the law and the practice of the Revenue Department have been in unison they proposed to collect the revenue just as if there had been no question at all about it—viz., the ad valorem duty and the 35s. stamp. They had been collecting it during the four years, and if they exempted persons who had not paid they must refund. The Bill of Indemnity should be brought in without unnecessary delay.

Mr. Lopes said the Chancellor of the Exchequer was under a misapprehension when he stated that the duty had been demanded during the last four years. He had presented a petition from a numerous body of solicitors stating that up to the time of Boulton's case this 35s. had in no instance been demanded.

The Clerical Disabilities Bill was introduced by Mr. Hibbert.

The Revesting of Mortgages Bill.—Mr. Dodds said it had been found desirable to alter the principal clause in this bill to such an extent as to render necessary a change in the title of the bill itself. The order for the second reading was, therefore, discharged.

March 1.—Parliamentary Registration.—Mr. Dodds introduced a bill.

March 2.—The Life Assurance Companies Bill.—Committee. Clauses 1 and 2 (title and interpretation of terms) were agreed to and progress reported.

March 3.—The Stamp Duty on Leases Bill.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that in pursuance of the pledge he gave a few days ago in reference to the statement which had been made respecting the law concerning stamps on building leases, he had instituted inquiries on the subject, and had, in consequence, been satisfied he might not do complete justice by doing that which he had previously thought would be sufficient. He had considered the case carefully, and was now convinced that the indemnity must extend to the period when the decision was pronounced by the Court of Exchequer, and the object of the present measure was so to extend it. Then it was necessary to provide for future cases. The House was aware that he was under an engagement to bring in a bill on the stamp laws, and it was necessary to bridge over the period between the introduction of that bill and the present time. He had, therefore, anticipated matters, and as that bill would contain a clause reducing the stamp duty on building leases from 35s. to 10s., he had thought it convenient to make that reduction by the present bill, instead of leaving the duty at 35s. in the interval. The measure which he now asked for leave to introduce contained two clauses, the first extending the indemnity to the time pronounced by the Court of Exchequer, and the second fixing the duty on building leases at 10s. instead of 35s.

The bill was read a first time.

PENDING MEASURES IN LEGISLATION.

A BILL TO EXTINGUISH THE ESTATES OF MORTGAGERS ON PAYMENT OF THE MORTGAGE DEBT.

Whereas it is expedient to exonerate the owners of real property from the expense of getting a re-conveyance of a satisfied mortgage estate:

Be it enacted, &c.:—

1. When any person now or at any time after the passing of this Act, competent to give a discharge for the moneys for the time being due on any mortgage or other security, shall by some writing acknowledge or declare that the same have been paid or satisfied, then and thereupon and thenceforth the hereditaments comprised in such mortgage or other security, whether the same be of freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or other tenure, shall be held for the same estates or interests, and in the manner and right in all respects as the same would have been held had such mortgage or other security never been made.

2. Every such writing as aforesaid shall be chargeable with the same stamp duty as would have been payable upon a re-conveyance of the mortgaged property.

3. In the case of lands of copyhold or customary tenure such writing as aforesaid shall not operate to extinguish the estate of the satisfied mortgagee until a memorandum of the satisfaction of the mortgage debt be endorsed on the Court Rolls, and such memorandum shall be so endorsed by the steward of the manor upon production of such writing as aforesaid, and upon the signature thereto being verified by affidavit, and for endorsing the same, the lord of the manor and his steward shall be entitled to the same fees as they would have been entitled to in case the mortgage security had been transferred instead of extinguished.

4. The word person in this Act shall mean any one person or any number of persons, and any corporation aggregate or sole.

5. This Act shall not extend to Scotland.

OBITUARY.

SIR JAMES S. MENTEATH, BART.

The death of Sir James Stuart Menteath, barrister-at-law, of the Middle Temple, took place at Mausfield House, Ayrshire, N.B., on the 27th February. Sir James Menteath was born in 1792, and was therefore in his seventy-eighth year. He was the eldest son of Sir Charles Granville Stuart Menteath (who was created a baronet in 1833), by Ludivina, daughter of Thomas Loughnan, Esq., of Madeira. Sir James was educated at Rugby, and became a member of the Faculty of Advocates in 1816, in the same year that Lord Colonsay and Lord Ivory were admitted to the Scotch bar. He afterwards entered as a student of the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar by that society in May, 1834. He has been a deputy-lieutenant of Dumfriesshire since 1828, and is the author of a work on the geology of the Snowdon range. A younger brother of the deceased baronet is Mr. Charles Granville Stuart Menteath, who was also called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1829. This gentleman now becomes heir-presumptive to the baronetcy, the late Sir James having left no family, and being succeeded in the title by his nephew, James Stuart Menteath, who was formerly an officer in the 17th Lancers. The deceased baronet married, in December, 1846, Jane, daughter of Sir Joseph Bailey, Bart., and succeeded his father, as second baronet, in December, 1847.

MR. A. RUNNACLES.

The death of Mr. Anthony Runnacles, solicitor, of Brighton, took place there on the 23rd of February. Mr. Runnacles was a native of Harwich, having been the eldest of the surviving sons of Mr. Harcourt Runnacles, of that place. He was certificated as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1851, but did not begin practice at Brighton till some years afterwards. Mr. Runnacles leaves a mother, five brothers, and three sisters surviving. He was in his forty-third year at the time of his death.

MR. G. FINCH.

We have to record the death of Mr. George Finch, solicitor, of Craven-street, Strand, and of Gloucester-street, Hyde Park, who expired on the 23rd February, in his forty-second year. The late Mr. Finch was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1850, and was a member of the legal firm Fladgate, Clarke, & Finch, of Craven-street, Strand.

MR. C. J. JONES.

Mr. Charles James Jones, solicitor, of Spital-square, Norton Folgate, died on the 21st February, at the age of seventy-three years. The late Mr. Jones was certificated in Hilary Term, 1843, and since 1860 has carried on business in partnership with his son, Mr. William Lucas Jones, the firm being styled C. J. Jones & Son.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The usual monthly meeting of the Board of Directors of this Association, was held at the Law Institution, London, on Wednesday last, the 2nd inst. Mr. J. S. Torr in the chair.

The other directors present were, Messrs. Hedger, Park Nelson, Shaen, and Sidney Smith. Mr. Eiffe, secretary.

A sum of £100 was voted in grants of assistance to necessitous applicants, widows and daughters of deceased solicitors. Forty-one new subscribers were elected, twelve as life and twenty-nine as annual members, and other general business of the Association was transacted.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society held on Tuesday, the 1st inst., Mr. Austin in the chair, the following question was discussed:—Is accord and satisfaction with a person injured a defence to an action under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, by his representatives after his death? The question was opened by Mr. Appleton, and after a discussion in which eight members took part, was decided in the negative by the chairman's casting vote, the votes on either side being equal.

Two gentlemen were proposed as members. The number of members present was fourteen.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this Society held in the Hall of the Honourable Society of Clement's Inn, Clement's-inn, Strand, on Wednesday last, with Mr. E. D. Eagles in the chair; Mr. George Lewis moved, "That the laws relating to patents require amendment."

After an animated discussion the motion was carried by a majority of six.

EQUITY AND LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY

The annual general meeting of the shareholders in this society was held at the society's house, 18, Lincoln's-inn-fields, on the 25th ult., George Lake Russell, Esq., in the chair.

Mr. T. B. Sprague (the actuary and secretary) read the advertisement convening the meeting, and the report of the directors.

The following is a copy of the report:—

The past year closes the fifth quinquennial period for which the society has existed, and the directors, in making their annual report to the proprietors, think it well to extend their review to the operations of the whole of the five years.

They have again the satisfaction of reporting that the new business of the year has exceeded that of any previous year. There have been 184 new policies issued, insuring £370,495 2s. 8d. The new premiums thereon amounted to £13,923 11s. 9d., in which however it should be stated, there is included an unusually large amount of single premiums, viz.—£3,952 11s. 11d. The amounts paid away for new re-assurances have been, in annual premiums, £573 3s. 3d., and in single premiums £1,141 14s. 10d.; so that deducting these, the net new business has been, annual premiums, £9,397 17s. 7d., and single premiums, £2,810 17s. 1d.

The total premiums of the year amount to £101,541 6s. 8d., and the interest on investments to £30,795 4s. 4d. Sundry small receipts raise the income to £134,307 16s. 11d., exclusive of £2,352 10s. received for the purchase of annuities. The outgoings of every description were £83,819 0s. 11d., and the increase of the assets in the year is therefore £52,841 6s.

In the last five years, the amount of the assets has increased from £443,966 to £736,615.

Recent events have forcibly illustrated the dangers attendant on secrecy in the conduct of insurance companies. The directors have always published full statements of the receipts and expenditure of the society, with such other particulars as seemed useful; but, being of opinion that it is the duty of every life office which claims the confidence of the public, to place its stability beyond all question, they have decided to give a still more complete exposition of the society's affairs, by bringing together the figures contained in the published accounts of the last five years. This is accordingly done in the following table, by which the progress of the society from year to year, may be traced with the greatest facility.

A glance at this table shows that the claims were last year heavier than usual. They were, indeed, nearly £4,000 in excess of the expectation; but taking into consideration the whole of the quinquennium, the claims have fallen short of the expectation by nearly £16,000. During the year 1869, there have died 26 persons, whose lives were insured under 55 policies. Of these 32, for the sum of £39,000, were on the participating scale, and the bonuses thereon were £6,405 3s. 9d. The remaining 23 policies, insuring £18,201 3s. 1d., were on the non-participating scale of premiums. The total payments for claims amounted to £63,606 6s. 10d. reduced however to £51,901 6s. 10d. by the receipt of £11,705 from other offices under reinsurance policies.

The amounts of the assets and of the total sums assured during the last five years have been as follows:—

	Assets.	Sums assured.
On 31st December, 1864.....	£443,966.....	£2,178,766
" 1865.....	496,700.....	2,373,983
" 1866.....	544,651.....	2,568,495
" 1867.....	615,821.....	2,803,652
" 1868.....	683,774.....	3,027,386
" 1869.....	736,615.....	*

* Will be stated in the Bonus Report.

The amount of the funds, exclusive of reversions, having been £601,976 at the beginning of the year 1869, it will be seen that the interest received in the year is rather more than 5 per cent. on this amount.

Taking a general view of the five years, it will be seen that in addition to £127,776 10s. 9d. received as interest on investments, less income tax, there has accrued a profit of £42,574 14s. 4d. from the falling in of reversions and the sale of the Chancery-lane property. Adding these together, it may be said that the whole of the funds have been improved during the last five years at the average rate of six per cent. per annum.

In view of the preceding facts the directors cannot doubt that the results of the fifth division of profits which they anticipate will be made known in June next, will be highly satisfactory both to the proprietors and to the assured.

The directors retiring by rotation are Mr. Hughes, Mr. Bristowe, Mr. Potter, and Mr. Armstrong. The retiring auditors are Mr. Boodle for the proprietors and Mr. Bailey for the assured. All these gentlemen offer themselves for re-election.

The motion for the adoption of the report having been unanimously carried, the retiring directors and auditors were re-elected.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Consols have been pretty steady this week at a trifling improvement. The amount of business done at the fortnightly railway settlement this week is considered small, but business has been fairly brisk in the new transactions. The principal feature in the railway market has been a sharp rise of three per cent. in Great Western, consequent on a dividend being declared of half per cent. higher than was anticipated. Those fortunate individuals who bought these shares a few months ago are now in a position to realise ten per cent. per share upon sale. Indian railway securities continue at what is considered a low price. Foreign securities have been rather at a discount this week. There has been a brisk demand for accommodation at the Bank rate.

The Prospectus of the Foreign and Colonial Government Trust, announcing a second issue in certificates of £100 each bearing 5 per cent. interest to be issued at £80, has been published. The object, which is now well understood, is to give to the investor of moderate means the same advantages as the large capitalist, in diminishing the risk of investing in Foreign and Colonial Government Stocks by spreading the investment over a number of different stocks, and reserving a portion of the extra interest and the amounts received in redemption as a sinking fund to pay off the original capital; and, in addition, to give to each subscriber a pro rata participation in the ultimate reversion in these different stocks, which will remain when the return of the original capital has by these means been accomplished. The trustees are the Right Hon. Lord Westbury, Lord Eustace Cecil, M.P., and Geo. W. Currie, G. M. W. Sandford and Philip Rose, Esqs.

It is reported that the vacancy in the Scotch bench caused by the death of Lord Barcaple will be filled by Sheriff Mackenzie.

The Town Council of Salford, near Manchester, have resolved to take steps for securing a separate commission of the peace for that borough.

Mr. John Paterson has been elected sheriff of the city of London for the present year, in succession to Sir James Valentine, deceased.

Mr. Thomas O'Dowd, solicitor, of Dublin, and brother of Mr. James O'Dowd, assistant-solicitor to the Board of Customs in London, has announced his intention of contesting the borough of Sligo on nationalist principles. Mr. T. O'Dowd is a brother-in-law of the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Keogh.

LEGAL STUDIES AT CAMBRIDGE.—The Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University has given notice that the Chancellor's prize for the encouragement of legal studies will not be awarded this year, the examiners being of opinion that no candidate of sufficient merit has presented himself at the examination.

LONDON, MARCH 12, 1870.

THE POINT OF LAW INVOLVED in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt—viz., whether the insanity of the respondent is a bar to a suit for dissolution of marriage—is likely soon to be decided. This question, it will be remembered, was raised by a summons to stay the proceedings on the ground that the respondent was insane. A trial before a jury was ordered to try the fact of the alleged insanity, and the jury found that the respondent was insane from the commencement of the suit until the present time. It then only remained for the judge to make an order on the summons, which he did on Tuesday last. The order is "that no further proceedings be taken in the suit until Lady Mordaunt recovers her mental capacity, the petitioner to apply to the Court whenever he is able to affirm her recovery."

In making this order Lord Penzance guarded himself against being supposed to express any opinion on the question whether or not the respondent's insanity was a bar to the suit. The matter was not argued before him, and the order was only a formal one (following the authority of Bawden v. Bawden, 10 W. R. 292, the only decision on the point), so that an appeal against it might at once be presented to the Full Court, where the question can be fully argued.

Although Lord Penzance gave no opinion as to whether permanent insanity would be a bar to the suit, he suggested that whichever way that point were decided it might nevertheless be held that a suit should not be continued during a temporary derangement. This is a matter which rather affects the procedure of the Divorce Court than the main question raised in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt, but it seems a most reasonable suggestion, and one that will doubtless receive full consideration from the Court when the case is argued.

WE HAVE OBSERVED in the Irish Times this week two or three articles reflecting in very strong—almost indecent—terms upon the Vice-Chancellor of Ireland, and, in particular, calling attention to some dozen cases in which his Honour's decisions have been reversed on appeal. We do not observe that the Irish Times makes any mention of the cases which have been affirmed on appeal; and, without this information, we cannot form any opinion as to the amount of accord between the Vice-Chancellor and the Court of Appeal, if that be material for any purpose. But, in truth, this question is not material, for the merits of a judge of first instance cannot possibly depend upon the amount of difference between his views and those of some other judge or judges who are not necessarily more likely to be right—in the abstract—than he is. Of course, if an inferior judge resolutely refuses to give way to the views of the superior tribunal, and persists in following his own reversed judgments rather than the decisions of the Court of Appeal (and we have known instances of such a course), this is ground for grave animadversion upon his conduct; but to say that a judge is unfit for his position—and the Irish Times does not hesitate to say this of the Vice-Chancellor—because his decisions have been occasionally, or even frequently, reversed on appeal—a result which might happen from the incompetence or ill-will of the appellate judge—is an obvious absurdity.

In truth, however, this sort of attack, however reprehensible, is not new: we recollect a precisely similar attempt to discredit the Master of the Rolls some years ago, when it so happened that a long list of his decisions had been reversed by Lord Chancellor Westbury, and matters were even carried so far that a question was asked upon the subject in the House of Commons. The supposed grievance, however, was very summarily disposed of by Sir Roundell Palmer, who then held, if we recollect right, the office of Solicitor-General; and in the seven or eight years which have since elapsed, although numbers of his Lordship's decisions have been appealed from, with varying success, we have heard nothing more of this absurd charge, and not only so, but it is now proposed, without, so far as we know, a single dissentient voice, to elevate his Lordship himself to the Court of Appeal, and that for a reason which, if there were any personal objection to the appointment, would be simply ludicrous.

None of the cases in which the Court of Appeal in Chancery have differed from Vice-Chancellor Chatterton have yet been carried to the highest Court of Appeal. In one of the most important of these cases, Sheppard v. Murphy, it appears from what fell from the Court of Appeal in Chancery in England, in Coles v. Bristowe, that, in the opinion of that Court at least, the principle of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment was right, though he, in common with the Court of Common Pleas and at least two of the Vice-Chancellors in England, had misapprehended the nature of the particular contract entered into by the defendant.

THE CASE of Brown v. The Midland Railway Company, decided in the county court at Hertford, which will be found reported in another column, raised a question under the much litigated 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31). That section deprives railway companies of the power of limiting their liability for loss of or injury to goods by any general notice or condition, but allows them to limit it by conditions which shall be adjudged to be just and reasonable, provided that no special contract between railway companies and persons sending goods by them shall be binding upon the sender, unless signed by the sender. What is a just and reasonable contract under this section has often been discussed. Peek v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company, in the House of Lords (11 W. R. 1023), is perhaps the leading case on the subject, although, unfortunately, there was a great difference of opinion between the law lords who gave judgment, and also between the learned judges who gave their opinions to the House, and in consequence of this difference of opinion the construction of the section can hardly be considered settled.

In Brown v. The Midland Railway Company the plaintiff sent drain pipes and other goods by the defendants' railway, and gave the defendants a consignment note signed by himself, in which the carriage was expressed to be "at owners' risk." The goods were damaged, and the question (amongst others) arose what was the effect of these words. The county court judge decided, first, citing Peek v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company, that the words "at owner's risk" would exonerate the defendants from all liability whatever; and secondly, that such a contract was unreasonable, and therefore void under section 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act.

There seems to be some doubt as to the correctness of this view. In Peek's case it was held (Lord Chelmsford dissenting) that the words "the company shall not be responsible for the loss of or injury to" goods, would exempt the company from all liability. Since this decision, however, it has been held that the words "accidents or damage of the seas" (Grill v. General Iron, &c., Company, 14 W. R. 878); "not accountable for leakage" (Ohrloff v. Briscall, 15 W. R. 202); "goods to be free of breakage, leakage, and damage" (Czech v. General Steam, &c., Company, 16 W. R. 130); "not liable for any loss arising from suffocation" of animals (Leam v. Dudgeon, 16 W. R. 80) do not relieve carriers from liability for damage caused by their negligence. These decisions follow others to the same effect decided before Peek's case. According to these cases it is at least doubtful (although it must be remembered that they are all decisions respecting carriage by sea) whether "at owners' risk" would be construed to mean more than that the carriers would only be liable for their negligence, and not for damage caused otherwise, for which, as common carriers, they would, without some special contract, be responsible. This point is, however, treated in the judgment as conclusively settled by Peek's case.

It does not appear whether any evidence was given in Brown v. The Midland Railway Company to show that there were any special circumstances which rendered it reasonable that the goods should be carried solely at the risk of the owner, and, therefore, it seems that the decision was right on this point, because if "at owners' risk" excluded all liability, the provision was prima facie unreasonable, although evidence might have been given to show that it was not in fact unreasonable; as if a lower rate was charged for carriage in consequence of the defendants being under no liability for any loss, &c. (See per Blackburn, J., in Peek's case and Allday v. Great Western Railway Company, 13 W. R. 43.) The judgment, however, takes no notice of this question, and is consequently incomplete as an exposition of the law, although the decision arrived at on this branch of the case seems correct.

IT IS WELL KNOWN THAT many benefit building societies are in the habit of receiving money on deposit, and paying interest, in fact, of opening deposit accounts after the manner of bankers. On Monday last the question was raised before Vice-Chancellor Malins whether this practice is legal. It appeared that the Victoria Permanent Benefit Building Investment and Freehold Land Society of Birmingham is being wound up in chancery, that its debts are £26,000, of which £25,000 is due to depositors, and that a call had been made on the shareholders to obtain the means of paying the depositors. A shareholder resisted the call, on the ground that it was ultra vires for the society to act as a savings bank. The Vice-Chancellor held that it was ultra vires, and that the depositors were not entitled to have calls made on the members for the repayment of their deposits.

The ratio decidendi of the Vice-Chancellor was that, although he was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Laing v. Reed (L. R. 5 Ch. 4, 18 W. R. 76) to hold that a rule enabling the trustees of a building society to borrow a limited amount of money is not contrary to the Building Societies Act, and, therefore, not ultra vires, still a power of borrowing to an unlimited extent would clearly alter the nature of the society from what it was intended to be, and was therefore, ultra vires. In Laing v. Reed there was a rule authorising the trustees to borrow to a limited amount. In the present case there was no such rule. In Laing v. Reed the Court of Appeal held that a rule authorising the society to borrow a limited amount is not ultra vires, but Vice-Chancellor Malins now says that the society may not borrow without such a rule. Would it be ultra vires to frame a rule empowering the society to borrow without limit? The true answer to questions of this kind seems to be,—does the thing complained of, or the rule authorising it, tend to substitute some alien object for the object of a building society as recognised in the Acts? If it does that it is ultra vires in either case. Viewing the matter in this light, we can hardly agree with Vice-Chancellor Malins that it is ultra vires for a building society to borrow at all without a special rule for borrowing. We cannot see why it should be ultra vires to borrow sums merely incidentally required to facilitate the object of making advances; and we think that this is the true meaning of the decision in Laing v. Reed. But undoubtedly it is ultra vires for a building society to become a bank, and the amount borrowed may be the test of the intention.

There is this further difference between the present case and that of Laing v. Reed, that in Laing v. Reed the application was for an injunction to restrain future borrowing, while in the Victoria case the Court was asked to declare that no calls should be made on the members for repayment of moneys which the society had actually had and disposed of. It is one thing to say—"Your directors shall at your instance be forbidden to borrow;" and another thing to say, "You shall not be required to repay what your directors have already borrowed and you have had the benefit of." In the case of a joint-stock company, where money has been borrowed ultra vires but expended for the benefit of the company, the shareholders are liable to calls for its repayment, to the extent of their unpaid capital. The Cork and Youghal Railway case, 18 W. R. 26, is a case in point. There is, however, a wide difference between the uncalled up capital of a joint stock company and the future instalments of a building society's shares, and the question is whether such instalments can be anticipated or called up for such a purpose.

IT SEEMS LIKELY that before many years are over we shall really have something in the nature of a public prosecutor. The Government have not indeed introduced a bill, but they may fairly regard themselves as having their hands full and fall back upon the principle, at least, of the old rhyme as to "one thing at a time, and that done well." Mr. Eykyn, however, with Mr. Vernon Harcourt, has just brought in a public prosecutor bill. We believe everyone is agreed that there is a want to be supplied. How it is to be supplied is a question on which there are many opinions. In the main the choice lies between two plans—either a complete department of public prosecution with sub-sections appropriated to classes of offences, or the slighter alteration of appointing local officers to conduct prosecutions which, under our present law, are never begun, or, if ever undertaken, drop through. The present measure is based on the latter scheme. It authorises the appointment in districts or boroughs of solicitors of ten years' standing to be "public prosecutors." The public prosecutor thus created "may mero motu suo prosecute any felony or misdemeanour alleged to have been committed within his district, or may assume the conduct of a prosecution begun privately; this he may do if the case is one for which costs are allowable; otherwise he is to act only if directed by a judge or the Attorney-General or required by justices of the peace. He may drop a prosecution at any time if he sees no probability of conviction, or for "any other reason." "Circuit counsel," barristers of ten years' standing, one to each circuit, are also to be appointed to advise with the public prosecutors.

The scheme of which these are the main features appears to have been adapted from the Scotch system. Properly carried out it would certainly be an improvement on the present state of things. It will not be malapropos to append to this brief account of it a notice of a case which occurred this week at the Lambeth County Court. The case was that of a tallyman, and the defendant swore that his name signed to an authority for his wife to pledge his credit with the plaintiff, was not his (defendant's) signature. The writing, he said, was that of his landlord, and was written at the wife's request at a time when defendant was from home. The judge then ordered defendant to write his name, and on his having done so declared that the defendant had committed gross perjury, the two writings being exactly alike. On being again solemnly adjured to speak the truth the defendant admitted that he had signed the authority. The judge then went on to say that he should certainly order the defendant to be prosecuted for perjury if such an order were of any use. He could order a prosecution but he could not order any one to prosecute, and there being no public prosecutor the delinquent would in all probability escape unless the plaintiff chose to take upon himself the responsibility and expense, which he was not likely to do. Some years ago he had ordered prosecutions, but had learned better as he grew older, and found that such orders were utterly futile. These observations of the learned judge point to one of the gravest aspects of the public prosecutor question. Perjury in county courts is doubtless very common, and is largely increased by impunity to the frequent injury of honest suitors.

ON WEDNESDAY LAST an important question as to the construction of section 11 of the Habitual Criminals Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 99) arose on the Home Circuit, before Keating, J., in Reg. v. Harwood. That section provides that, on proceedings against persons as receivers of stolen goods, a previous conviction of certain specified offences may be proved "as evidence" of the prisoner's knowledge that the goods were stolen, provided that notice is given to the prisoner "that proof is intended to be given of his previous conviction, and that he will be deemed to have known such goods to have been stolen until he has proved the contrary."

The prisoner was indicted for receiving a stolen bank-note. The note had been stolen from the prosecutor, and was found in the prisoner's possession. A previous conviction seventeen years ago was proved against the prisoner, but there was no evidence that he knew that the note was stolen when he took it. The prosecution argued that in consequence of the possession of the stolen goods after a previous conviction the prisoner must, in the words of the notice required by the Act (which had been duly given), "be deemed to have known such goods to have been stolen until he had proved the contrary," although neither these nor any similar words are in the enacting part of the section. Keating, J., said that he was happy to say that such at present is not the law, and held that the prisoner was not called upon to show that he did not know that the note was stolen. It would be superfluous to comment upon the carelessness which has allowed such a discrepancy between the enacting part of the section and the notice required under the section.

It was also argued for the prisoner at the outset of the case that the word "goods" in section 11 did not include a bank note, and Keating, J., said he would reserve the point if necessary.

The prisoner was acquitted; these questions, therefore, will not be argued, and the construction of the section must still remain in doubt. We have before (ante, p. 21) pointed out the difficulties in the construction of the Act, and we cordially join in the hope expressed by Keating, J., that the attention of Parliament may soon be directed to this subject, and the law upon it made more clear.

A "COUNTY CORONERS' BILL" has been dodging in and out of Parliament for some time. At first it was proposed that the office should no longer be elective. This provision, however, was afterwards exchanged for one similar to that in the bill now pending, which enacts that the county coroner shall be elected by the freeholders on the Parliamentary Register. At present the franchise for coroners' elections is subject to no limitation whatever beyond that of the statute of Edward III., which confirms the right of election in the "commons of the counties," the result being that a square foot of freehold would be a qualification, and that there is an utter uncertainty as to who the electors are. To this extent Mr. Goldney's bill would, if it became law, be an improvement. But the best thing by far would be to render the office no longer elective. We are not opponents of local self-administration; but in this instance we cannot blind our eyes to the inexpediency of making the election to so responsible an office depend on the suffrages of many thousands of county voters. In a minor degree the system is open to all the disadvantages which in America have resulted from the American method of electing judges.

The present bill applies to coroners' elections all the existing Bribery Acts, and also provides for a payment by fixed salary to be settled between the coroner and the justices, the Home Secretary being the ultimate arbiter. It contains also some provisions relating to borough coroners.

THE NATURALIZATION BILL.

We described last week, as concisely as possible, the chief features of the Naturalization Bill, which has been read a second time by the House of Lords, without a division, and passed through committee on Thursday last. We now propose to discuss the measure more in detail. Before doing so it may be desirable to indicate what is the existing state of the law, and why it requires alteration. By English law all persons born within the dominions of the British Crown, are natural-born British subjects, and so are persons born abroad whose fathers or grandfathers, ex parte paternâ, were natural-born British subjects. Thus we recognise the jus soli in its integrity, and to a certain extent the jus sanguinis. Aliens labour under the following disabilities—they cannot hold real property except on a twenty-one years' lease for occupation or business, they cannot own the whole or any share of a British ship, they cannot exercise any franchise, fill certain offices, or sit in Parliament, or in the Privy Council. An alien may be naturalised in three ways—(1) by Act of Parliament, which makes him a natural-born subject to all intents and purposes; (2) by certificate of a Secretary of State, which leaves him incapable of sitting in Parliament or the Privy Council; (3) by certain statutes, aliens who occupy certain exceptional positions are ipso facto naturalized, but this kind of naturalization is of such unfrequent occurrence that it may be practically disregarded. Lastly, the allegiance of a natural-born subject is indelible. Nemo potest exuere patriam is the maxim of the English law. If, therefore, an English subject goes to France, and is naturalized there; although he becomes a French citizen, he does not cease to be an English citizen. Such are the principles of our law, but there has been for some time a glaring inconsistency between our pretensions and our practice. Theoretically, we claim millions of the citizens of the United States as British subjects. Practically, we can exercise no rights over them, although they can—and many of them did during the civil war—invoke our protection. Nothing is more likely to cause a rupture between England and the United States than the complications which might arise out of this doctrine. The chances of such a rupture will, as Lord Derby pointed out, be materially lessened if the Naturalization Bill passes into law; especially as the bill is founded upon the protocol signed by Lord Stanley and Mr. Reverdy Johnson in 1868, and embraces most of the recommendations of the Royal Commission of the same year.

First of all it may be observed that the bill does not alter in the least the persons who now are natural-born subjects. The child of an alien father born within the dominions of the British Crown will still continue to be a natural-born subject. In this respect the recommendations of the Royal Commission, which proposed that the child of an alien father might be registered as an alien, has not been followed. So, too, a person born abroad will be a natural-born subject, if his father or grandfather, ex parte paternâ, was a natural-born subject. But the bill proposes to make an alteration in the status of aliens. It takes away from them many existing disabilities but not the disability to own the whole or a share of a British ship, which is retained for reasons too obvious to need detailing, nor does the bill qualify them for any office or for any municipal, parliamentary, or other franchise. It is also provided that the section under consideration (section 2) "shall not affect any estate or interest in real or personal property to which any person has or may become entitled, either mediately or immediately, in possession or expectancy, in pursuance of any disposition made before the passing of this Act, or in pursuance of any devolution by law on the death of any person dying before the passing of this Act." So that for this purpose the section is not retrospective, although for all others it is. The most important alteration that it makes is that it enables aliens to hold land in the United Kingdom on the same footing as natural-born subjects. A proviso was added in committee that it should be lawful for her Majesty in Council to suspend the operation of the Act as to the enjoyment of property by alien subjects of any state at war with her Majesty, during the continuance of hostilities. While increasing the privileges of aliens in other respects the bill very properly abolishes the jury de medietate lingue.

Next must be observed the important provision of the bill recognising and establishing the principle of expatriation—i.e., enabling a British subject exere patriam. The provision is substantially that any British subject, who has at any time before and may at any time after the Act become law, when in a foreign state and not under disability—(i.e., infancy, lunacy, idiotcy or coverture), voluntarily become naturalized in such foreign state, shall cease to be a British subject and become an alien. This section (section 5) has a proviso, that any British subject who at the date of the Act has become naturalized in a foreign state and yet desires to remain a British subject, may make a declaration of such desire within two years from the date of the Act, and take the oath of allegiance. He will then be deemed a British subject except so long as he is within the territories of the state in which he has been naturalized; but if by the law of that state, or in pursuance of any treaty he ceases to be a citizen of that state, then he is to be deemed a British subject even within the territories of that state. Mere residence abroad for any length of time will not convert a British subject into an alien. It is only when he becomes by naturalization the subject of another state that he will cease ipso facto to be a British subject, and will become an alien. And here it must be noticed that if a man becomes a statutory alien his wife will become so also, but the clause defining the status of his children is extremely obscure. It says that where the father or the mother, if a widow, becomes a statutory alien "any child of such father or mother, who during infancy has become resident in the country where the father or mother is naturalized, and has according to the laws of such country become naturalized therein, shall be deemed to be a subject of the state of which the father or mother has become a subject and not a British subject." This means apparently that if by the law of the place where the naturalization takes place, the naturalization of the father operates to naturalize his children also—as it does in the United States in the case of minor children resident in the States—then the children of the statutory alien are also statutory aliens; but if not then they remain British subjects. This rule then would operate thus—if B., a British subject, resident in the United States and having two sons, C. a minor, and D. an adult, both born and residing in the United States, is naturalized, C. becomes an alien, but B. remains a British subject. But if B. were resident in a country where the naturalization of the father does not naturalize his minor children neither C. nor D. would become aliens by B.'s naturalization.

The next question is—What procedure does the bill prescribe for obtaining naturalization. It repeals 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, by which certificates of naturalization could be granted by a Secretary of State, and proposes to enact (by section 7) as follows:—

"An alien who, within such limited time before making the application hereinafter mentioned as may be allowed by one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, either by general order or on any special occasion, has resided in the United Kingdom for a term of not less than three years, or has been in the service of the Crown for a term of not less than three years, and intends when naturalized either to reside in the United Kingdom or to serve under the Crown, may apply to one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for a certificate of naturalization. The applicant shall adduce in support of his application such evidence of his residence or service and intention to reside or serve as such Secretary of State may require; the said Secretary of State, if satisfied with the evidence adduced, shall take the case of the applicant into consideration with or without assigning any reason, give or withhold a certificate as he thinks most conducive to the public good, and no appeal shall lie from his decision, but such certificate shall not take effect until the applicant has taken the oath of allegiance."

The effect of such certificate is to entitle the grantee to all the political and other rights of a British subject, and to subject him to all consequent liabilities, with the exception that, within the territories of the state of which he was a subject previous to obtaining the certificate, he shall not be deemed a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject thereof by the laws thereof or in pursuance of any treaty. This is extremely reasonable and proper. If the subjects of other states can expatriate themselves by becoming naturalized in England, then they are to become by naturalization British subjects only; but when a state will not allow its citizens to expatriate themselves, then, if any subjects of such state are naturalized in England, they will be thenceforth British subjects everywhere except in the territories of such state.* Finally, the clause provides that anyone who has been naturalized before the Act may apply for a certificate under the Act, and that, where any doubts exist as to the nationality of a British subject, a certificate of naturalization may be granted to set at rest such doubts.

The following section (7) contains a provision as to the expediency of which a question was raised at the second reading. A statutory alien is to be entitled to a certificate of re-admission to the status of a British subject on taking the oath of allegiance, performing the same conditions and adducing the same evidence as are required in the case of an alien applying for a certificate of naturalization. If the certificate is granted (the Secretary of State can withhold it) the grantee resumes his status of British subject from the date of the certificate; but within the limits of the foreign state of which he became a subject he shall not be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject of that foreign state according to the laws thereof, or in pursuance of a treaty to that effect. No objection was raised to the privilege of repatriation being conceded to a statutory alien, but it was urged that it should only be granted where, by repatriation, the statutory alien would cease to be a citizen of the state of which he was previously a subject.

The 8th section confers on the Secretary of State, who has the power of granting certificates of naturalization or re-admission to British nationality, a power of cancelling any such certificate "on its appearing to him that the grantee thereof has resided out of her Majesty's dominions for a term exceeding two years, and that he intends permanently so to reside; or on its appearing to him that the grantee of such certificate has acted in a manner inconsistent with his allegiance as a British subject."

This extensive power of revoking a grant of naturalization or re-admission to nationality seems of question—able propriety. It is, in the first place, too arbitrary, and, in the second, it is hardly equitable to the grantee, for if by naturalization in England he has expatriated himself from his former country, then, if his certificate is cancelled, he will become a citizen of no state—as it were an international res nullius.* The principle of section 3 is not open to a similar objection, for a naturalized alien can only divest himself of his status of British subject by a declaration of allegiance when her Majesty has entered into a convention with the state of which he was a subject before naturalization that “citizens of that state who have been naturalized as British subjects may divest themselves of their status as such subjects.” Such a convention would, by implication, if not expressly, effect, that persons who, in pursuance thereof, divested themselves of their status as British subjects, would again be re-admitted to their former nationality.

Having thus discussed the more interesting features of the bill in extenso, the exigencies of space will only permit us to glance at some of the less interesting but equally important provisions. Expatriation is not to discharge from liability for antecedent acts (section 15). The bill is not to affect the grant of letters of denization (section 13). Colonial legislatures may (subject to the control of her Majesty) make laws to impart to any persons the privileges of naturalization within the limits of their jurisdiction (section 16). All fines and fees (with the consent, in the latter case, of the Treasury) are to be settled by a principal Secretary of State.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE UNDER THE CODE NAPOLEON.

(Communicated by a Paris correspondent.)

We recently reprinted, under the above title, an article extracted from the Pall Mall Gazette,† interesting from its subject, but calculated to give erroneous notions of the law and the judicial institutions of France. The first error, which occurs at the very beginning, is one which, emanating from the pen of a non-legal writer, is certainly a very venial sin. A writer not familiar by profession with the practice and application of the law in France may be excused for saying, in the words of the Pall Mall Gazette, that the Code Napoleon “has certainly the merit of being so mathematically simple that everybody who can read is able to judge for himself, without the help of a solicitor, what things he may and may not do.” That, no doubt, has been, and is still, not unfrequently the boast of the general French public when they compare their laws with the more complicated systems of other nations; but the lawyers who framed their Code, even in the first fervour of their work, never indulged in the dream of so impossible an achievement. They did not shut their eyes to the inevitable shortcomings of their plan, nor did they conceal them from the public. In the preliminary report of the first sketch of the Civil Code, by Portalis, Tronchet, Bigot-Prémameu and Malleville, we find a passage directed against the very mistake which has found its way into the columns of the Pall Mall Gazette. It runs thus:—“It would be an error to believe that a body of laws may exist providing for every possible case, or intelligible to every citizen.” They never dreamt of having entirely avoided obscurity or incompleteness, of having provided for the French people a legal oracle which would never be silent, and which would always be intelligible to the vulgar. Had they cherished such a fond hope they would not have preserved it long.

Question upon question sprung up in luxuriant vegetation between the joints of the articles—questions which had never been thought of when those articles were framed—for which it was necessary to provide. For the solution of these the judges had to appeal to the “spirit of the law” (l'esprit de la loi). That “spirit” was first sought for in the deliberations contained in the reports and arguments of the Tribunal and Council of State, both of which bodies had, in a certain measure, a hand in its formation, and the numerous volumes of whose reports and “proces verbaux” are consulted to the present day. When these had been searched in vain it became necessary to go deeper, and to delve down into the ruins of the old law, from which the architects of the new had taken the greater part of their edifice, and which they had, as they thought, finally closed up as a mass of rubbish from which all the good had been taken, and which was dedicated henceforth to oblivion and decay. It was, however, necessary to return to this for the purpose of stopping the gaps in the new law. The old customary law of certain provinces and of Paris, from which certain parts had been taken, and of the Roman law in vigour till the Revolution in certain parts of the south, which had furnished others, had to be resorted to again in the search for data for the interpretation of the new law, or for matter to eke out its insufficiency and cover wants which had not been thought of. The instances in which the judges have been thus obliged to supply, from extraneous sources, the insufficiency of the new law have been numerous. The article 4 of the Civil Code threatens them with prosecution if they refuse to judge by reason of the “silence, the obscurity, or insufficiency of the law.” They have interpreted that silence, thrown light into that obscurity, eked out that insufficiency as best they might; and their efforts to do so are recorded in several scores of quarto volumes, which are under the eye of every lawyer as he sits in his library; they remind one how unsuccessful have been the efforts to put law into formulæ of “mathematical simplicity” sufficient to make “everybody who can read able to judge for himself, without the help of an adviser, what things he may and may not do.”

The very conciseness and brevity of those formulæ show that such cannot be the case, because that brevity is purchased partly at the cost of employing technical and theoretical terms of which the layman cannot know the import. And many of the articles of the Code, fluent and simple as they are in appearance, would be as unintelligible to the layman as a choice passage out of Fearn’s Contingent Remainders.

But not only to the profanum vulgus are those oracles often obscure, but to the sages of the law themselves they are not infrequently perplexing. Indeed, the most learned amongst those sages have differed as to the meaning of certain of the articles.

The Court of Cassation—that court placed over all the other courts of France for the purpose of rectifying their errors in the law, and of being the regulating court (cour régulatrice) for the preservation of uniformity in the interpretation of the laws—has differed from itself on several questions, some of them of much importance and frequency. So much for the transparency of the articles of the Code, and the facility with which any one of the million may see to the bottom of them. Clearly expressed they almost invariably are. Intelligible to the layman, in their essence, not infrequently—as where they have laid down rules of conduct and established forms to be followed by the general public, and which the authors of the Code Napoleon have taken pains to clothe in language as familiar and untechnical as possible. But technical language cannot be avoided in articles of law laying down principles in an aphoristic form. They cannot be made intelligible to the general public. The most lengthy explanations would be necessary, which in bulk would soon become what the collection of the Roman laws was said to be before the Corpus Juris, the load of several camels. The actual letter in many of the articles is, therefore, impenetrable to all who have not obtained the key of it by legal studies. As to their spirit, their scope and application,

* The section was attacked on the first of these two grounds by Lord Westbury and Lord Penzance in committee. Special objection was taken to the last three lines of the section as quoted above. The Lord Chancellor admitted that the words were too vague, and undertook to consider the point, and to state his decision when the report was brought up.

that, in articles which read the clearest, is sometimes a matter of the most serious difficulty even for the initiated, and even a French lawyer would be very much astonished at the temerity of the layman who should think himself competent to fathom their depths.

His astonishment would be no less in discovering that, in the words of the Pall Mall Gazette, a man, in civil cases, can have recourse successively to five jurisdictions. In reality, the rule is that there are never more than two. The writer cumulates things that should not go together. The first of his five degrees is the justice of the peace, "who," says he, "has power to adjudicate (it might have been added—finally) as to all sums not exceeding one hundred francs." He is the judge of such small actions, without appeal, to the amount of one hundred francs; with appeal to the tribunal of first instance, to that of two hundred; besides a variety of actions of small importance in particular cases, for which the law has given him jurisdiction. Beyond those cases he is no judge; he merely interferes as conciliator. The law, under the influence of certain arcadian ideas which were in vogue in the philosophy-loving times of the first revolution, had, with well-meant but unpractical efforts to prevent litigation, created the institution of the juges de paix mainly for the purpose of making them, in reality, what their name imports—judges of peace. And that they might the more fully deserve the name, it was ordained that they should act as peace-makers in all actions. This same function was likewise given to them by the new regime. By article 49 of the new Code of Procedure, which is still in vigour, it was decreed that no action should be begun between parties competent to make a compromise and in a case where a compromise would be lawful, until there had been an unavailing attempt by the juge de paix to bring the parties to agree, or a citation given by the plaintiff to the defendant to appear before that functionary for that purpose. Should the juge de paix have succeeded in bringing the parties to settle their difficulty amicably, the action is put an end to by the agreement of the parties, and not by the act of the judge. He does not interfere judicially; he gives no decision, no judgment, on the matter. And, indeed, his duties in this respect are very seldom called into operation at all. Appearance is enforced only by a fine of ten francs for non-appearance, and even that is frequently avoided by treating the case as one requiring despatch—a circumstance which authorises the president to shorten the time for appearance and to dispense with the preliminary of conciliation. So that, in practice, the well-meant but nugatory effort of the philosophers of the revolution against litigation, results in an additional item in the bill of costs.

Beyond the limit of jurisdiction of the juge de paix civil actions are taken to the tribunal of first instance, commercial actions to the Tribunal of Commerce. In both instances, when the subject-matter can be expressed by a sum of money, the amount of which does not exceed 1,500 francs, the jurisdiction is final. Above that sum, whatever may be the amount, one single appeal is allowed to the parties. That lies before the Imperial Court within whose territory the tribunal sits, and whose decision is final. Thus, in all civil as well as all commercial actions, there are never more than two degrees of jurisdiction, in a large proportion only one. True it is that in all cases in which a judgment is final, an application may be made to the Court of Cassation for a new trial. There is nothing to prevent the attempt being made, but it can only succeed on grounds of law, never on the question of fact. The Court of Cassation can never be concerned with issues of fact. It was instituted and has been preserved for the purpose of regulating the formation of French jurisprudence, and securing its uniformity. One of the greatest evils of the old regime was the confusion which the old parlements, or provincial courts of France, created—being respectively independent, and each sovereign and uncontrolled within its own territory—by their frequently conflicting decisions, which there was no superior judicial authority to rectify. To prevent the same evil from arising out of the new courts of appeal, the greater number of which made the danger more serious, it was determined to put over them all one common superior—a supreme court to which all others should be amenable, and whose authority in matters of law should be conclusive. But its authority is limited to matters of law. The most monstrous violations of justice, the most glaring error in a question of fact (question de fait), the Court of Cassation must leave untouched and unredressed. Vice versa, the most just decision, if it contain an error of law, must necessarily be quashed (cassé) by the Court of Cassation. That accomplished, the Court can go no further. It cannot itself give judgment on the case. It can only consign the case for decision to a Court of the same degree as that from which the judgment has issued. It has no jurisdiction in itself, and any attempt to bring before it a decision in a civil case, in which a violation of the law cannot be alleged and prima facie established to the satisfaction of the chamber of requests (chambre des requêtes), a section of the Court of Cassation in which the cases undergo a preliminary sifting, is stopped at the very outset by that chamber. There are some other errors in the Pall Mall Gazette article, the correction of which would require more space than we can afford to bestow at present.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

DISPUTED TITLE IN SUITS FOR PARTITION.

Giffard v. Williams, V.C.S., 18 W. R. 56.

The proposition generally laid down in the books that partition cannot be made the means of trying a disputed title, must be taken with some qualification. The Court has jurisdiction to decide questions of title in a partition suit, where the primary object of the suit is partition; and in such a case the Court will give time to the plaintiff to make out his title, if necessary (Cartwright v. Pullney, 2 Atk. 380). But a suit ostensibly for partition, with the real object of trying a disputed title, is a species of fraud on the Court which will not be tolerated. In Slade v. Barlow (17 W. R. 366, L. R. 7 Eq. 296), which was, in fact, an ejectment bill, Vice-Chancellor James, on it appearing that a question of construction was raised in the pleadings, ordered the bill to be retained for a year, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action. "A partition suit," said the Vice-Chancellor, "is based on the assumption that there is no litigation;" which is perfectly consistent with what was said by Vice-Chancellor Stuart in Giffard v. Williams, if we understand Vice-Chancellor James to have referred, as he must necessarily have done, to litigation contemplated at the institution of the suit. Lord Justice Selwyn in Bolton v. Bolton (L. R. 7 Eq. 298, n.), agreed with Vice-Chancellor Knight-Brace in Potter v. Waller (2 De G. & Sm. 417), that a bill for partition cannot be made the means of trying a disputed title. But as we have already seen, where the primary object is partition, an incidental dispute as to title is no bar to the relief. Vice-Chancellor Stuart scouted the notion that a suit for partition cannot be maintained if the title be disputed by the defendant, and be a legal title only. There is no distinction between equitable and legal titles for the purpose of a partition suit, the decree in which is of course, provided the title be good. And if incidental disputes as to the title do arise, the Court has jurisdiction to dispose of them whether the title be legal or equitable. But the Court has no jurisdiction under Sir John Rolfe's Act to dispose of purely legal questions arising in a suit like Slade v. Barlow; and the course pursued in that case will probably be followed in others, where it is sought to try a title under colour of a bill for partition; namely, to retain the bill until after the legal questions are tried at law, and thus to render the suit still available for partition, should partition then be desired.

ALLEGATIONS TO PREVENT DEMURRER.

Grenville Murray v. Earl of Clarendon, M. R., 18 W. R. 124, L. R. 9 Eq. 9.

The proposition that every statement in a bill is admitted to be true upon argument of a demurrer may be a little overstretched. The truth is this, that mere general statements in a bill are not enough to defeat a demurrer. It will not do, for instance, to charge that a particular fund was a trust fund, unless you also allege facts which, being necessarily admitted to be true, support the charge. You cannot make a fund a trust fund so as to give the Court jurisdiction by simply calling it so, any more than you can make an act fraudulent by alleging that it was a fraud. The equity of the bill must be supported by allegations showing what that equity is with something approaching to particularity; in point of fact it is the circumstances in which the equity is clothed, which are technically admitted to be true upon demurrer. In Frietas v. Dos Santos (1 G. & J. 574) all that the bill disclosed a simple money demand enforceable at law. The pleader added the general charge that there were mutual accounts, which ought properly to be taken in equity. This general charge was held to be not enough to save the demurrer.

In the absence of any allegation as to the nature of the accounts, the allegation that the funds drawn annually by the Foreign Office for the purpose of meeting current expenses were trust funds, in the sense in which that word is used in equity, was held in Grenville Murray v. Earl of Clarendon to be not enough to give the Court jurisdiction to take the accounts at the suit of a dismissed servant of the Foreign Office, there being no allegation to show in what respect the fund was a trust fund. The case was not otherwise of interest to the legal reader, but appears noticeable as a good exposition of what the principles of the Court really are with reference to demurrers. Mere general allegation, it must be repeated, will not do.

ADMISSION OF ASSETS.

Cadbury v. Smith, M. R., 15 W. R. 105, L. R. 9 Eq. 37.

The general question is too large to be entered on here. But it may be observed, with reference to the particular case, that the payment of one legacy by executors is not necessarily an admission of assets for the payment of others. Such payment need not be conclusive for more than one reason; it may have been made on the executor's own responsibility, or from mistake; and in either case the Court will scarcely order payment of other legacies without taking the accounts. The executor who has chosen to pay a legacy out of his own pocket, as in Cadbury v. Smith, does not thereby bind himself to pay all other legacies, without reference to the state of the assets. If it were a debt that he chose to pay out of his own pocket, the payment probably would be construed (though the Master of the Rolls disapproves of the law in this respect) as an admission of assets to pay debts of a superior degree, but not those of an equal degree. But for payment of a legacy to be an admission of assets to pay other legacies, it must be payment by the executor in that character. If an executor pays small legacies to servants, on his own responsibility, without reference to the state of the assets, he does not incur the liability to pay all the legacies given by the will: Postlethwaite v. Mounsey, 6 Ha. 33 n. What the Court looks to is the intention with which the payment was made. So, too, with respect to cases of payment in mistake, the rule is the same, provided such payments have been made bona fide. Payment of a legacy on an erroneous construction of a will was held to be no admission of assets on the true construction in Clark v. Bates, 2 De G. & Sm. 203.

In the other branch of the case, that with reference to the Statute of Limitations, there was little difficulty. Thirty years had run, and the words of the Act are express that no legacy can be claimed after the lapse of twenty years (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 40). If a fund to answer the legacy had been set apart, a trust would have been created which no time would have barred (Phillipo v. Manning, 2 My. & Cr. 309); but this was not done. And it should be observed that the defence founded on the statute was not rebutted by the allegation that the plaintiffs did not know when the will was proved, inasmuch as the probate of a will is notice to everybody having any claim under it.

ASSIGNMENT OF DEBTOR'S ENTIRE PROPERTY TO A SINGLE CREDITOR—EVIDENCE TAKEN IN OTHER COURTS.

Allen v. Bonnett, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 183.

There is something suspicious, it must be confessed, about a conveyance of this character. For the conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of all or any part of a debtor's property to constitute an act of bankruptcy under the late or the present law such conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer must have been fraudulent. Now, the word fraud here has been decided to mean fraud on the policy of the bankrupt law, as well as fraud in the moral sense; and, although the intention to defraud may have been wanting, yet, where the effect of the debtor's act has been to put it out of his power to go on with his business, and meet his other creditors, he is presumed to be guilty of a fraud against the policy of the bankrupt law, which aims at an equal distribution amongst all the creditors: Woodhouse v. Murray, 15 W. R. 1109. Hence the presumption, in cases where a debtor has assigned away his entire property. "I take it to be perfectly well settled," said Parke, B., in Siebert v. Spooner, 1 Mo. W. 718, "that where a trader (debtor at the present day) makes an assignment of all his effects, or of all except a very small portion, it is necessarily an act of bankruptcy, without any constructive fraud." In Ex parte Fozley, 16 W. R. 422, the Lords Justices decided that a conveyance by a debtor of his whole property, with the exception of his furniture and book debts was an act of bankruptcy; and that the exception of the furniture and book debts was not enough to take the case out of the rule laid down by Baron Parke.

But this rule must not, after all, be taken without some qualification. A conveyance of a man's whole "solventy"—i.e., that which enables him to pay his way and keep on his business—is an act of bankruptcy, for the simple reason that it deprives him of the power of satisfying his other creditors. But a conveyance by a debtor, even of all his property, to secure an advance, which he applies in payment of his existing debts (Re Colemore, 14 W. R. 318), or where there is no reason to doubt that the general body of the creditors will have the benefit of it (Harris v. Ricketts, 4 H. & N. 1) is not fraudulent. In Mercer v. Peterson (16 W. R. 486) an assignment of a debtor's entire property to secure a debt and further advances was not considered an act of bankruptcy; chiefly, it would seem, because the fact that further advances were contemplated was evidence of the debtor's intention to carry on his business. Much will depend, in such cases, upon whether it is consistent with mercantile usage that the advances should be made (Bittlestone v. Cook, 4 W. R. 493); and something will turn on the evidence of what was the lender's intention, whether to assist the debtor to go on or not (Re Colemore, ubi sup.). It comes after all to the question, what was the intention of the parties.

In Allen v. Bonnett the question was not whether the conveyance was an act of bankruptcy, but whether it was fraudulent and void under the statute of Elizabeth as against the creditors. The decision followed Alton v. Harrison (17 W. R. 1034). The conclusion in the case was that it makes no difference as regards the statute of Elizabeth, whether the deed deals with the whole or only a part of the debtor's property. The only question is that of intention. Secrecy does not amount to fraud, although it may be an element to be considered in determining whether there was fraud or not. The only question is that of the intention of the parties, and that the Court, as has been decided over and over again, gathers from the effect of the transaction.

It will be seen that the Vice-Chancellor took the same view as the Master of the Rolls did on a former occasion (s.c., 16 W. R. 1075), that an order of course to read depositions in the bankruptcy is irregular, as they may be made evidence in the usual way: Lake v. Peisley, L. R. 1 Eq. 173, a contrary decision of the Master of the Rolls is therefore overruled.

COMMON LAW.

CONTRACT OBTAINED BY FRAUD—REPUDIATION OF CONTRACT.

Meldon v. Lawless, C. P. (Ir.), 18 W. R. 261.

This case may serve as a good example of the meaning of the rule that a contract obtained by fraud is voidable, not void. The action was for rent. Plea that the defendant was induced to take the lease by the plaintiff's fraud. Held on demurrer that the plea was bad, because it did not aver that the defendant had repudiated the contract when he discovered the fraud.

If the innocent party to a fraudulent contract chooses, after he has ascertained the fraud, to abide by the contract, he has a perfect right to do so, and the party guilty of the fraud cannot dispute the validity of the contract on the ground of his own fraud. The innocent party has thus usually the option (subject to some exceptions, as where the rights of third parties are involved) of affirming or rescinding the contract. If he ascertains the fraud and then does nothing to show that he repudiates the contract, that may be sufficient evidence that he intends to adopt it, notwithstanding the fraud. If he wishes to rescind the contract he must give it up altogether, he cannot retain a beneficial part and abandon the rest.

A voidable contract is therefore to be carefully distinguished from one that is void. The best instance of a void contract is the case of two or more persons agreeing to commit a crime. Such a contract is absolutely void, and no party to it can take advantage of it or enforce it in any way. There are other kinds of contracts which may be absolutely void in civil proceedings, as in some cases contracts in restraint of trade, or against public policy on other grounds.

The distinction, therefore, between void and voidable contract is clearly marked, and is often of much importance, especially when those defences are alleged in pleas to an action on a contract.

WARRANTY OF TITLE—SALE OF INVENTION.

Smith v. Buckingham, Q.B., 18 W. R. 314.

It is usually laid down as a rule of English law that there is no warranty of title on the sale of an ascertained chattel. This rule, however, must be taken as being subject to more than the usual number of exceptions, and in Sims v. Marryatt (20 L. J. Q. B. 454), Lord Campbell said that the exceptions "well nigh eat up the rule." The most instructive case on the subject is Eicholtz v. Bannister, where the rule was very fully discussed. It was there held that "if the vendor of a chattel at the time of the sale either by words affirm that he is the owner or by his conduct give the purchaser to understand that he is such owner, then it forms part of the contract, and if it turns out that in fact he is not the owner, the consideration fails and the money so paid by the purchaser can be recovered back." It will usually be implied in law on the sale of a chattel that there is a representation by the vendor that he has a good title to the chattel sold, because "in all ordinary sales the party who undertakes to sell exercises thereby the strongest act of dominion over the chattel which he proposes to sell, and would, therefore, commonly lead a purchaser to believe that he was the owner of the chattel." This is usually the case, but there may be sales in which from their nature there can be no implied warranty of title. It has accordingly been held that there is no warranty of title on the sale of a forfeited pledge by a pawnbroker: Morley v. Attenborough (3 Ex. 500), or where goods are bought at a sheriff's sale: Chapman v. Speller (19 L. J. Q. B. 239), or on the sale of a patent right: Hall v. Conder (5 W. R. 491). In these cases, which are but examples of the principle, the mere fact of selling does not give rise to the presumption of a warranty.

The result of the cases is that, on the sale of an ascertained chattel, the law usually presumes a warranty of title, although the surrounding circumstances of the sale may negative that presumption. This is far more accurate and more easily remembered than the rule usually laid down which is really "well nigh eaten up with exceptions."

The question whether there is a warranty of title on the sale of an invention was discussed in Smith v. Buckingham on demurrer to a plea. The real difficulty in the case was as to the construction of the plea, and this point has no general interest. The judgment, however, recognises and adopts the rule as to warranty of title on the sale of an invention. Cockburn, C.J., says "where one person is supposed to have invented some article, and another under that supposition agrees to buy that invention, the buyer who has taken his chance cannot turn round and say to the inventor there is no invention." That is, there is no warranty of title on the sale of a thing like an invention, because the nature of the case negatives the ordinary presumption of law. The judgment, however, goes on: "but the case may be different where a person believing that he has discovered some process, sells that process as if it existed, whereas in fact it has no existence save only in the imagination of the vendor. In such a case I cannot say that the purchaser is bound."

The distinction between the two cases put by Cockburn, C.J., is clear. In the first there is something in existence, which the vendee gets, whether it is of great or small value. He gets all the rights of the vendor, and therefore he has at least a chance of getting something. In the second case the vendee gets and can get absolutely nothing in any event, and there would, therefore, be a total failure of consideration. The judgment in Smith v. Buckingham illustrates a rule of law that is not always very well understood, although the actual decision turned on the construction of an ambiguously worded plea.

SEVERAL FISHERY—TIDAL RIVER—CHANGE OF COURSE.

Mayor, &c., of Carlisle v. Graham, Ex., 18 W. R. 315.

In this case the Court of Exchequer were, in the words of Kelly, C.B., "called upon to decide the question which now arises for the first time. Is the several fishery of a subject in a tidal river, the waters of which permanently recede from a portion of its course and flow into and through another course where the land on both sides of the new channel belong to another subject, transferred from the old to the new channel, and so a several fishery created in such new channel, or in some part of it." The Court decided that the fishery is not transferred from the old to the new channel. There was no direct authority on the point, but it was argued that the rights of the public and of the Crown may be exercised over a new channel of a tidal river as soon as such new channel is formed, and that, therefore, the private rights enjoyed over the old might also be enjoyed over the new channel. The judgment, however, distinguishes the two classes of rights. It recognises the fact that "all the authorities, ancient and modern, are uniform to the effect that" the rights of the Crown and of the public over a new channel of a tidal river come into existence when such new channel is formed, but that the right in the soil of such channel remains in the former owner; and, if the new channel were to become dry, the land would be again free from all rights of the Crown or public. As the title of the defendants to the fishery in this case was derived from a grant by the Crown, and as the title of the Crown to make such grant was derived from its ownership of the soil (Murphy v. Ryan, 1 Ir. Rep. C. P. 143, cited and approved in this judgment), it followed that the defendants could not claim a right of fishery in a new channel of a tidal river when the soil does not and never did belong to the Crown. Some further reasons, derived from considerations of convenience, were also mentioned in the judgment as additional grounds for the decision.

REVIEWS.

The Practice of the Court of Referees on Private Bills in Parliament, with Reports of Cases as to the Locus Standi of Petitioners, During the Sessions, 1867-8-9. By FREDERICK CLIFFORD of the Middle Temple, and PEMBROKE S. STEPHENS, of Lincoln's-inn, Barristers-at-Law. London: Butterworths.

Before 1864 all questions as to the locus standi of petitioners opposing a private bill were heard and determined by the Committee to whom the bill was referred, a practice which was attended with very great inconvenience; counsel and witnesses had to be in readiness up to the last moment to support the petitioner's opposition on its merits, when after all, the Committee decided that the petitioners were not entitled to be heard. To obviate this it was ordered that the referees should on all petitions decide beforehand as to the petitioner's locus standi, and the Court of Referees was established accordingly. Besides this duty of deciding questions of locus standi, the Court of Referees had also in certain cases to investigate certain matters relating to the merits of the bill. This latter function did not prove satisfactory; it was found that the inquiries of the referees and of the committees, to use the words of the authors of the present work, overlapped each other, and in consequence, in March, 1868, an alteration was made. The inconvenience of the double inquiry was done away with, and at the same time the tribunal deciding on the merits was strengthened, by an order empowering the Committee of Selection to refer "any opposed private bill or any group of such bills to a committee composed of four members and one referee." The referees still remain as a separate court to try questions of locus standi.

It is the practice on the latter subject that the work before us aims at elucidating. The institution of the Court of Referees was intended to secure, besides the removal of the inconvenience first alluded to, some uniformity of decision on questions of locus standi, and though the Court does not give its reasons when it decides the questions, a security and uniformity has been attained to which we were strangers before this Court was established. The books usually consulted by practitioners in this department are those of Mr. Fawcett and Mr. Shireess Will, with the well-known work of Mr. Smethurst on Locus Standi, in which decisions are digested, and Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, the sixth and last edition of which was published in 1868. The authors point out in their preface that none of the decisions of 1867 or later years are included in these works. They are accordingly reported in an appendix to the treatise before us, arranged in six groups; viz., cases relating to (1) practice; (2) owners, lessees, &c.; (3) traders, freighters, &c.; (4) competition; (5) municipal authorities; (6) shareholders, mortgagees, &c. The history and practice of the subject are detailed tersely and accurately, and in a very intelligible manner in the treatise. There is also a print of the Courts of Referees Act, 1869, and a double index, one of reports and the other of subjects. To counsel or agents engaged in parliamentary practice the work will prove extremely serviceable.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 16th of March, at 8 p.m. This meeting will not be the anniversary meeting which is unavoidably postponed to Wednesday, the 30th of March.

COURTS.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

March 9.—Re Hilliar.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 125, Rule 284.

Reed applied for leave to file a resolution of creditors, notwithstanding that the period allowed by the 284th rule had expired.

It appeared that the debtor had filed a petition for liquidation or composition under the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and a meeting was held under the provisions of the statute on the 2nd of March, at which the creditors resolved to accept a composition of five shillings in the pound. The resolution was placed in the hands of the chairman for registration, but he, through an inadvertence, and in the belief that seven days were allowed for that purpose, omitted to file it within the three days allowed by the 284th rule; and upon the resolution being presented for registration on the sixth day the registrar declined to receive it unless by order of the Court.

The CHIEF JUDGE, on being satisfied that the omission to register the resolution within the period prescribed by the rule had arisen through a mere inadvertence, granted the desired leave.

Solicitor, J. R. Miller.

Re Hughes.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 13.

R. Griffiths, for the creditor petitioning for an adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor, applied for an interim injunction to restrain the holder of a conditional bill of sale, executed by the debtor, from continuing an action brought against the receiver.

On the 24th February a petition for adjudication was filed, service of which was ordered to be made upon the debtor in Spain, and on the 25th a receiver was appointed and possession taken of the debtor's property. On the same day an action of ejectment was commenced by the holder of the bill of sale against the receiver for the purpose of turning him out of possession. It was submitted that the terms of the 13th section were sufficiently comprehensive to justify the Court in making an order, although the action was not in strictness brought in respect of a "debt provable."

The CHIEF JUDGE.—You may give notice of motion for Monday next.

Solicitors, Lowther & Co.

March 10.—Anonymous.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, Rule 49—Commission to examine witnesses—Counsel—Practice.

In this case a petition for adjudication had been filed against a debtor and a commission had been granted (ante 375) under the 49th of the new rules for the examination of two witnesses resident in the country in support of the petition.

R. Griffiths, for the petitioning creditor, now applied that leave might be given for counsel to attend the examination of the witnesses.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the employment of counsel was a matter entirely in the discretion of the petitioning creditor, and it was unnecessary for him to give any direction upon the subject. No doubt the evidence would be taken in the mode usually adopted upon a commission issued by a court of law or equity; and if, in the interests of justice, it was expedient to employ counsel, the petitioning creditor would probably do so, but his Lordship could not make any order in the matter.

COUNTY COURTS.

HERTFORD.

(Before P. M. LEONARD, Esq., Deputy Judge.)

Feb. 1, March 2.—Brown and Another v. The Midland Railway Company.*

Railway company—Railway and Canal Traffic Regulation Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 7—Carriage at "owners' risk"—Unreasonable agreement—Practice—30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 1. This action (which was partly heard by the judge in

* Compare Woodger v. Great Eastern Railway Company (12 S. J. 766.)

December last) was brought to recover the sum of £4 5s. for damages to certain drain pipes, closet pans, chimney pots, &c., consigned by the plaintiffs to three of their customers, two of whom lived within the district of this court, but the third did not. Leave to sue in this court was granted by the registrar upon an affidavit of the plaintiffs' manager that the cause of action arose in wholly or in part within the district of this court.

At the hearing before the Deputy Judge objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the court, which point was reserved, and the case proceeded on the merits.

Mr. Shepherd, solicitor, Luton, appeared for the plaintiffs.

Edge, for the defendants.

Judgment reserved.

On the 2nd March inst. the Judge (Mr. Gordon) read the following judgment, in which he stated that he fully concurred:—

In this action the plaintiffs seek to recover from the defendants the sum of £4 5s. on account of damage done by them to certain drainage pipes and other articles entrusted to them as carriers. [After reading the particulars annexed to the plaint his Honour proceeded]:—

From the evidence it appears that the pipes were carefully packed by the plaintiffs' men, in trucks belonging to the plaintiffs; and that the trucks were properly constructed. On the despatch of each of the trucks, a ticket or note in the following terms addressed to the station masters of the defendants' company was given by the plaintiffs to the defendants:—

"At Owners' Risk"—Mr. Bakewell, please forward in good condition; May 6th, 1869, the under-mentioned goods, received from yours respectfully, Henry Brown & Sons, Luton, No. 14115, pipes, to our order 122, at Ware, Great Northern Railway Company. Ch. W. E. Ensor."

The ticket accompanied the goods sent to the station master at Ware, on the 6th May, 1869, and a similar one was sent with those forwarded to Hertford on the 11th August following.

Upon the opening of the case before me a preliminary objection as to the jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the case was raised by the learned counsel who appeared for the defendants, on the ground that the defendants neither carried on nor had their principal place of business within the district of this court. In answer to that objection, section 1 of the 30th and 31st Vict. c. 142 has been relied on. By that section it is, amongst other things, provided that a plaint may be entered by leave of the judge or registrar of the county court in the district in which the cause of action wholly or in part arose. Did the cause of action arise within the district of this court? The first item in the particulars is for damage done to pipes on the transit from Wooden Box to Buntingford. As Buntingford is not within the district of this court, I am of opinion that the objection must be allowed as to that item, which must therefore be struck out.

With regard to the second and third items, namely, damage to pipes in the transit from Wooden Box to Ware, and from Wooden Box to Hertford, the causes of action appear to me to have arisen within the district of this Court, and the objection so far as those items are concerned, must accordingly be overruled. Now, as to the facts, it appears that when the trucks arrived at their respective destinations, it was discovered that several of the pipes were broken, and as to those consigned to Hertford, that the damage was caused by the defendants' servants. The defendants did not call any evidence. On their part it was, however, contended—first, that as the goods were forwarded at the "owners' risk," the defendants were not liable; and secondly, that the plaintiffs had themselves been guilty of such contributory negligence as would disentitle them to recover any damages. The question, therefore, is, are the defendants liable to pay the plaintiffs for the damage they have sustained? I may dispose of the second point of the defence by saying that there is no evidence of contributory negligence. It remains, therefore, to be considered whether the tickets I have referred to amount to a contract, and if they do, what is the effect of it. The Railway and Canal Traffic Regulation Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, s. 7, provides as follows:—

"Every such company as aforesaid [which includes the defendants' company] shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury done to, any horses, cattle, or other animals, or to any articles, goods, or things in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company, or by its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, or in anywise limiting such liability; every such notice, condition, or declaration being hereby declared to be null and void. Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said companies from making such conditions with respect to the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of any of the said animals, articles, goods, or things, as shall be adjudged by the court or judge before whom any questions relating thereto shall be tried, to be just and reasonable. . . . Provided also, that no special contract, between such company and any other parties respecting the receiving, forwarding, or delivering any of the animals, articles, goods, or things, as aforesaid, shall be binding upon, or affect any such party, unless the same be signed by him, or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods, or things, respectively for carriage."

Here the tickets containing the alleged contract are signed by the sender as required by the Act. But the words (at "owners' risk") if taken in accordance with the decision in Peck v. N. Staffordshire Railway, 6 W. R. 797,* to have been intended to exonerate the defendants from all liability whatever, would render the contract an unreasonable one; and, therefore, one into which the defendants could not compel the plaintiffs to enter, or by which they could not hold them bound if they did. The result is that the parties must resort to their common law rights and liabilities; and, by law, the defendants as common carriers, are bound safely and securely to carry goods entrusted to them for that purpose. In this case the defendants have not done so, and I am, therefore, of opinion, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover £2 15s. in respect of the last two items. As to the costs, considering that the plaintiffs have failed, with respect to the first items in their particulars, and that the court has power when a cause of action is struck out for want of jurisdiction to award the defendants costs, I think that the justice of the case will be met by leaving each party to pay their own costs.

Judgment accordingly for £2 15s., and costs (i.e., Court fees) 10s.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. DAVID SHERLOCK, of the Irish Bar, and M.P. for King's County, has been appointed Third Serjeant-at-Law in Ireland, on the vacancy occasioned by the elevation of Mr. Serjeant Dowse to the Solicitor-Generalship. Mr. Serjeant Sherlock is a son of Thomas Sherlock, Esq., a Dublin solicitor, by Isabella, daughter of John Ball, Esq., solicitor to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for Ireland. He was born in September, 1816, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; was called to the Bar in Ireland in Hilary Term, 1837, and was created a Queen's Counsel in July, 1855; he was recently elected a Bench of King's Inns, Dublin.

MR. THOMAS BURNETT WOODHAM, solicitor, of Winchester, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Hants, or county of Southampton, for the present year.

MR. PHILIP LONGMORE, solicitor, of Hertford, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of the county of Herts for the current year. Mr. Longmore took out his certificate in Easter Term, 1821, and is Town Clerk of Hertford, Clerk to the Magistrates, and Clerk to the Commissioners of Taxes; he is a member of the local firm of Longmore, Swower, & Longmore.

MR. EDMUND BUTLER EDWARDS, solicitor, of Pontypool, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Monmouthshire for the current year. Mr. Edwards was certificated in Hilary Term, 1847.

MR. GEORGE MOON, solicitor, of Woodbridge, has been appointed Under-Sheriff for the county of Suffolk for the current year. Mr. Moon's certificate as an attorney dates from Michaelmas Term, 1833.

MR. CHARLES JAMES ABBOTT, solicitor, of New-inn, Strand, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of the county of Surrey for the current year.

* Affirmed H. L., 11 W. R. 1023.

Mr. GEORGE WARREN LAMB, solicitor, of Kettering, has been appointed Under-Sheriff for the county of Northampton during the present year. Mr. Lamb's certificate as an attorney was taken out in Hilary Term, 1850. He holds the local offices of Town Clerk of the borough, Clerk to the Magistrates, and Registrar of the County Court.

Mr. FRANCIS GEORGE RAWSON, solicitor, of Nottingham, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of the county of Notts for the current year. Mr. Rawson is a member of the local firm of Freeth, Browne, & Rawson, and is Clerk to the borough magistrates.

Mr. WILLIAM HEAFORD DAUBNEY, solicitor, of Great Grimsby, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Lincolnshire for the current year. He was certificated in 1837, and he is Clerk to the county magistrates and Registrar of the Grimsby County Court.

Mr. ALFRED BARRAUD BURTON, solicitor, of Lincoln, has been appointed Assistant Under-Sheriff of Lincolnshire, and will perform the duties of the shrievalty as deputy to Mr. Daubney. Mr. Burton was certificated in Easter Term, 1862, and is a junior member of the local firm of Burton & Sons. He was formerly Under-Sheriff for the city of Lincoln.

Mr. HENRY HEFFILL, solicitor, of Diss, Norfolk, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of the county for the present year. Mr. Heffill was certificated in Easter Term, 1833, and is the senior partner of the local firm of Heffill & Salmon.

Mr. WILLIAM GRAY, solicitor, of York, has been appointed Under-Sheriff of Yorkshire for the present year.

Mr. FREDERICK FOWELL, solicitor, of Garboldisham, Norfolk, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. MICHAEL POPE, of Dulwich, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Surrey, also in and for the county of Middlesex, the city of London, and the city and liberties of Westminster.

Mr. MATTHEW SYKES SCHOLEFIELD, of Batley, York, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the West Riding of the county of York.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS REMUNERATION BILL.

Sir,—As an attorney personally, I have not the slightest objection to the passing of the Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill, for I am fully resolved that I shall never avail myself of the great privilege of getting any client of mine to bind himself by an agreement in writing respecting the amount and manner of payment of my services, and I am well assured that no practitioner of any respectability will ever do anything of the kind. But sometimes we should sink personal considerations.

I really am at a loss to know in whose interest the proposed bill is brought forward. Is it in that of the public, that they are to be called upon in the dens of the inferior practitioners who will avail themselves of the Act to sign a contract? If so I can only say the public have very little to thank Mr. Rathbone for. If it is intended to encourage the practice of the public running about to find who will do a job cheapest and sign an agreement to that effect, I am not clear that they will find themselves much better off in the long run. There are those who work in this way without the necessity of legislative sanction.

Is it in the interest of the attorney? Yes, indeed, it is, of the pettifogger who has transactions with clients who are either vulgar and illiterate or who cannot escape his clutches, to whose observance of engagements he cannot trust, and whom he can wheedle or bully into signing an agreement; but to the bulk of the profession, consisting as it does of honourable men who do not usually work by contract and do not wish to get large fees out of unwilling clients, it will be an entirely dead letter.

I should be very sorry to ask any client of mine to sign an agreement, and if I did I should not respect him much if he did not walk straight out of my office.

The idea of applying the principle of written contracts to remuneration of professional services is to my mind as absurd a plan as can be devised.

Take the other learned and skilled professions. Imagine a medical man contracting in writing the price at which he is to be remunerated for treatment of an attack of scarlet fever or of a broken limb—a barrister for the conduct of a defence—an architect or engineer for the construction of a house or works. They can all do this now—but do they?

Even as regards the remuneration of a trustee solicitor he will be worse off than ever if he relies upon the Act. Nothing can be more repulsive to a man of gentlemanly feeling than to ask for the consent in writing of his co-trustees to his charging his costs; and if his costs exceed £10 even the acquiescence of the cestui quo trust will not relieve him from submitting his bill to a taxing master.

The only thing in the bill of the slightest advantage to the public and the profession is the last section, allowing the master to take into account the skill employed in assessing remuneration.

Many a law suit has been averted by judicious tact and firmness in an interview or a letter for which the attorney gets a few shillings, whereas if he had been a bungler or a knave he might have reaped hundreds, and if the bill passes it is presumed that a man will be entitled to be paid, say fifty guineas for a journey instead of three, if his client has received that amount of benefit from his skill.

I look upon the rest of the bill as quite unnecessary, and that it will as before stated be only of advantage to inferior attorneys who have to deal with illiterate clients and who wish to undersell their brethren.

A GENTLEMAN &C.

THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—I think such a letter as that from "An Old Hand" in your last week's impression, should not have been allowed to appear in your columns. The letter I refer to was evidently written less for the purpose of exposing a public evil than for the purpose of slandering a large and highly respectable body of practitioners—the registrars of the county courts.

I am the registrar of a court issuing less than 600 plaints per annum, and I know very well the working of many similar courts, and I say unhesitatingly that in none of these do practices such as those described by your correspondent exist. I never knew or heard of a registrar who, either by himself or his clerks, "touted" for the issuing of either ordinary summonses or summonses under section 2 of the County Court Act of 1867; indeed the charge of "touting" for the issuing of ordinary summonses is simply an absurdity. Does your correspondent mean to say that the registrars or their clerks go about to the shopkeepers and urge them to issue summonses?

It seems to me also that the subject of the county courts is discussed in your columns for the most part in an unfriendly, not to say an unfair, spirit. It is quite right, and very much to the advantage both of the public and of the courts themselves, that your correspondents should point out any anomalies which may exist in the procedure of these courts, or should direct attention to any excessive or unfair fees which may be levied on them; but no sooner does a "hitch" occur in the procedure, or an officer happen to fail in the strict performance of his duty, than we have a letter from an indignant correspondent "who has practised in the county courts for the last time," (as though that would annihilate the county courts, or hurt anybody but himself!) or if a small extra fee is imposed on the issuing of a new and troublesome process, we have a sensation heading about the "atrocious fees under section 2;" and, to crown all, if "An Old Hand" is envious of a particular registrar who he tells you gets "about £100 added to his previous £700 per annum," then he makes your columns the means of circulating "atrocious" slanders on a body of men who have, with scarcely an exception, performed their duties not only with credit to themselves, but to the satisfaction of the country.

AN INDIGNANT REGISTRAR.

Mr. Frederick Alfred Trenchard, solicitor, of Taunton, has been appointed by the Crown to be Local Attorney in the Prosecution of Messrs. Vanderbyl, Fennelley, and Kinglake, for alleged corrupt practices at the last Bridgwater election. Mr. Trenchard has been in practice at Taunton for many years and has also for a long period attended the Registration Courts for the counties of Somerset and Dorset.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 10.—The Churchwardens' Eligibility Bill was read a second time, Earl Beauchamp explaining that it was intended to enable non-resident ratepayers to serve in small parishes.

The Naturalization Bill.—Committee. Clause 1 agreed to. Clause 2 supplemented with a proviso empowering the Crown to suspend in war time its operation as to enjoyment of property by aliens. Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to. Clause 5 was passed, the Lord Chancellor pointing out that the bill was confined to artificial naturalization, while nationality could only be dealt with by treaty. Clause 6 passed with three years substituted for five. Clause 7 passed. Clause 8 (cancellation of certificates of British naturalization or re-admission) the Lord Chancellor said should be reconsidered. Remaining clauses agreed to and bill reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

March 4.—Habitual Drunkards.—Mr. Dalrymple moved "That it is desirable to legislate for the proper reception, detention, and management of habitual drunkards." The subject was too large for a private bill. He thought power should be given to the magistrates to commit an habitual drunkard to the reformatory ward of the workhouse or to a reformatory to be established expressly for the purpose, and that the period of detention should continue until the person so confined could procure a medical certificate to show that he had obtained control over himself, or until his disease took the form as it frequently did of hopeless imbecility. The reformatories to be established for the reception of drunkards should be self-supporting, and in the event of a cure being effected the individual on his discharge should receive all he had earned above the bare sum expended for his maintenance in order that he should have the means of obtaining a new start in life.—Mr. Bruce said that if a private bill had been brought forward, the enormous difficulty of the subject would have been realised. He thought some voluntary efforts should first be made for establishing reformatories of the kind alluded to. State interference would be attended with enormous difficulties and disadvantages. The Government, however, proposed during the session to bring forward two measures, which would, he trusted, have a marked effect in checking the abuse of intoxicating liquors. By one they hoped to place mechanical difficulties in the way of procuring intoxicating drinks; but he trusted that far greater effects would result from the measure introduced by the Vice-President of the Privy Council, which would spread throughout the country sounder opinions and sounder knowledge, and which would therefore be the means of checking the mischiefs arising from drunkenness.—Motion withdrawn.

March 7.—Bankruptcy Law of Ireland.—In reply to Mr. Keown the Attorney-General said that, there being much diversity of opinion as to immediate assimilation to the new English law or waiting to see how that law worked, the Government did not intend introducing any bill at present.

Mr. W. H. Cook, Q.C.—Mr. Eykyn asked whether the William Henry Cook, scheduled as a briber in the report made to the House of Commons by the Commissioners to inquire into corrupt practices at Beverley, was the same person as Mr. William Henry Cook, Q.C., now one of the judges of the County Court for the county of Norfolk; and, if so, whether he was not, under section 45 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, rendered incapable, as being found guilty of bribery, of holding any judicial office; and, if in the judgment of the Government the statutable incapacity did not attach without further proceedings, it was their intention to institute such proceedings as might be necessary in the present state of the law to subject the person so scheduled to the disqualification imposed in the said Act?

The Attorney-General said there was no doubt as to the identity of the person. The second part of the question was one of very great difficulty. Section 45 of the Act provided that if any person other than a candidate should be found guilty of any proceeding in which, after notice of the charge, he had had an opportunity of being heard, then he should be disqualified. The difficulty was whether his being summoned and heard as a witness complied with the words of the section "having the opportunity of being heard:" or whether the Act did not mean as a person charged with an offence, and having a right, therefore, to cross-examine witnesses called against him, and adduce witnesses in his defence. In one sense Mr. Cook had an opportunity of being heard—he was heard to give evidence, but he had no opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses against him or of adducing witnesses in his defence, or making that defence which a person charged with a criminal offence ordinarily would have an opportunity of offering. The question could not be authoritatively decided except by some judicial interpretation. He had no right or power to give any authoritative opinion. It did not appear under existing circumstances to be the duty of the Government to take any proceedings of a judicial character against Mr. Cook.

Committal of a Jurymen at Norwich.—Mr. Haviland-Burke asked the Attorney-General whether the attention of the Government had been drawn, in an official form or otherwise, to the committal of the foreman of the jury for five days by Mr. W. H. Cook, Q.C., County Court Judge, while presiding in his official capacity at Norwich; whether the judge of that county court was justified in ordering the registrar to enter a verdict for the plaintiff before the jury had determined the verdict, which was eventually given for the defendant; and whether any and what steps would be taken by the proper authority to prevent the recurrence of such acts?

The Attorney-General said he had taken the opportunity of communicating with the learned judge of the county court, and, with respect to the first part of the question, he understood that the foreman of the jury was committed, not for anything done by him as a jurymen, but that after the trial was over and the jury was functus officio, he used some offensive and insulting expression to the judge, whereupon the judge committed him for five days, but on the jurymen expressing his regret the order of commitment was instantly cancelled. With respect to the second part of the question, he was instructed that the judge did not order the registrar to enter the verdict for the plaintiff. A memorial had been presented to the Lord Chancellor, and the matter was, he believed, now under his Lordship's consideration.

Stamps on Building Leases.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to Mr. Hadfield, said that he could not consent to postpone the bill he had introduced to indemnify certain persons who had been misled with reference to the stamps upon building leases.

The Irish Land Bill.—Mr. Gladstone moved the second reading.—Mr. Bryan opposed the bill. It would be useless unless entirely transformed. It erred in dealing unequally with north and south. The scale of compensation for eviction was too small, and the law of distress should have been abolished.—Captain White seconded the opposition. Fixity of tenure was the only remedy that would answer.—Mr. O'Reilly Dease, on the whole, supported the bill as an honest measure.—Sir H. Bruce supported the bill, though he thought interference between landlord and tenant was unnecessary.—Mr. Bagwell supported the second reading, but would oppose the third unless the bill were much altered in Committee. There was too much law in it.—Sir F. Heygate objected to interference with purchasers from the Landed Estates Court, but sympathised with the object of the bill.—Mr. Agar Ellis said that, though the bill had its weak points, it had its good ones, and the subject should be settled at once.—Mr. Kavanagh, on the whole, accepted the bill as a just settlement.—Mr. Pim thought it could be amended into a just settlement.—Mr. G. Gregory objected to State interference in land purchase, and thought the scale would promote absenteeism.—Mr. Whalley asked an assurance that the concession would remove the discontent which he attributed to the Roman Catholic hierarchy.—Mr. Brodrick objected to the public loans for land purchase and the retrospective compensation, but approved the bill on the whole.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue urged the representatives of landlords and tenants to combine for a prompt settlement, and lauded the simple machinery of the bill.—Dr. Ball thought both the merits and demerits had been exaggerated. Its political effect would be small, but it erred against economical and legal principles.—Debate adjourned.

The Stamp Duty on Leases Bill was read a second time.

The Judges Jurisdiction Bill was read a second time.

County of London.—Mr. Buxton introduced a bill for creating and regulating the county of London.

March 8.—The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned debate on the second reading.—Mr. Maguire hoped the bill would be amended in Committee. Inter alia the Ulster custom must be defined and distress abolished, both for rent, and in the labourers condition. He praised the land purchase part of the bill.—Mr. Hunt agreed with the Ulster custom and improvement compensation clauses, but the eviction scale was unjust to landlords, and purchasers from the Landed Estates Court were unjustly treated. He approved the purchase plan save as to very small holdings. The legal machinery would create and multiply legislation.—The Attorney-General said the Government would consider the expediency of limiting the time for compensation claims. The bill aimed at compelling Irish courts to recognise local customs as the English courts did. The Ulster custom could not be defined.—Mr. G. H. Moore, Mr. Samuelson, Mr. C. S. Read, and the O'Donoghue supported the bill.—Mr. Henley called the bill "a bill for the promotion of interminable litigation and for the extinguishment of small holdings."—Mr. Dowse said the English common law prevailed in Ireland only in letter not in spirit.—Debate adjourned.

March 9.—The Revestment of Mortgages Bill (by Mr. Dodds) was read a second time.

The Coroners Bill was read a second time.

March 10.—The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned debate on the second reading.—Colonel Wilson Patten thought the urgency of the case justified a bill which violated all rules of political economy.—Mr. Horsman thought the bill would restore quiet and content.—Mr. Pell approved it in the main.—Sir Roundell Palmer congratulated the Government on successfully steering between all the remedies proposed. He approved the bill. Interference with the contract law was justified by the hypothesis that the Irish landlord and tenant could not be trusted to contract together. He thought the "loan" clauses of small moment. The "courts" clauses were to cheapen, not promote litigation. But unless the law were vindicated in the protection of landlords' and tenants' rights, the bill would be waste paper, and he begged the Government to accompany it with measures to that end.—Lords Burke and St. Lawrence and Mr. Conolly and Mr. Monsell supported the bill.—Sir G. Grey opposed it.—Mr. Hardy did not admit the sufficiency of the grievance, but acquiesced in the second reading.—Debate adjourned.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Molony v. Symes and Others.

Next friend ordered to pay costs of proceedings set aside.

March 5.—The Lord Chancellor delivered judgment in this case, which stood over since Saturday week last. It was an application by Mr. Henry Molony, to set aside the proceedings, on the ground that they were brought by Mr. James G. Rynd, acting as solicitor for Richard Pigott, who was described as next friend of Mr. Molony, without Mr. Molony's sanction or knowledge, and on the allegation that he was a person of unsound mind, which allegation was unfounded.

The Lord Chancellor directed that the proceedings should be set aside, and that Richard Pigott, as the next friend who had instituted those proceedings should pay the costs incurred by Mr. Molony, as also the costs incurred by the defendants in the cause, as between solicitor and client, and in default of Richard Pigott in paying such costs, then that such costs should be paid by Mr. James Rynd, the solicitor who filed the bill, as he should have made more inquiries before he put upon the files of the Court a bill stigmatising Mr. Molony as a lunatic.

Commissioner Extraordinary for the London District.

Messrs. Pallet, Q.C., and S. Walker, applied that Mr. Dalton Thomas Miller (Miller & Miller), who was a solicitor of the English Court of Chancery, and an attorney of the superior courts of law, might be appointed a commissioner for taking affidavits for the London district for the Irish Court of Chancery. There had been eight commissioners for the London district, but six of them had either died or left London, and there were now but two commissioners—the Messrs. King, of Southampton-buildings. Mr. Miller's certificate had been signed by Lord Justice Giffard, Vice-Chancellor James, and Sir R. Palmer, and almost all the leading counsel of the English Bar, by the Lord Mayor of London, and several eminent merchants; and Lord Justice Giffard and Vice-Chancellor James had also certified that there was a necessity for the appointment of another commissioner, in consequence of the extent of the district.

The Lord Chancellor appointed Mr. Miller a commissioner.

REQUISITIONS ON TITLE AND OPEN CONTRACTS.*

If the client of any gentleman in this room called some morning, and said, "I have sold my estate at P. to Mr. F., and I wish you to do what is needful for me in furnishing evidence of my title as soon as possible, for I want the money," the answer would be, "But first you must have a contract." "Oh! but we have signed one already. Here it is—"I, A., agree to sell my estate called P., containing about 100 acres, now in my possession, at the price of £3,000, and I, F., agree to purchase the said estate at that price." A look of horror and pity would pervade the benevolent face of my hearer as he said, "My good friend, I sincerely sympathise with you. The price you have got is not a bad one when you get it, but it is highly probable you never will, or if you do it will be at the end of months, possibly years, after a considerable per centage has been expended in making out your title. I know that Mr. F. will be represented by Mr. X. (let us hope that gentleman is not present), and that you and I shall have to undergo a process of torture to which the rack and the thumbscrew (which were at any rate provided free of charge) were a joke.

Is a colloquy, which I might extend into a dialogue after the manner of Eunomus or Landor's "Imaginary Conversations," an event of rare occurrence?

There is no doubt that such a contract might afford a subject of litigation, not only on the question of title, but on its construction as to what the estate consisted of, and what the words "about" and "in possession" meant; fortunately country gentlemen and owners of house property generally have sufficient practical experience to know that their proper course (as the law now stands) is to have a formal contract drawn by a solicitor, if the sale is by private contract. The preparation of such a contract often involves the exercise of considerable judgment as to what should be introduced and what should not. Instances have occurred of hundreds of pounds more being obtained for a property in consequence of the contract not being too stringent, and of conditions being loosely drawn.

A property was subject to a covenant on restriction of trade of which no mention was made in the conditions. Two persons bid furiously against each other, and the property was sold at a considerable excess over the reserved price. The covenantees, not caring about the trade proposed to be exercised, released the covenant for a small consideration. Now, in this case, there would have been no competition if there had been any allusion to the restriction.

This is an exceptional case, and was one of an auction sale, but many analogous ones might suggest themselves.

Whenever I have to prepare a contract for sale (conditions of sale by auction are somewhat different) I feel rather humiliated by the reflection that I am doing a work for which there ought to be not the slightest occasion.

A horsedealer can buy or sell £5,000 worth of horses in a morning, or a broker millions of stocks without coming to his lawyer, merely by the interchange of notes and formalities well understood by his fraternity; but an unfortunate householder has to come to his lawyer before he can venture to accept an offer made for a property he is burning to realise.

Is this a proper state of things? Even if the contract is to be prepared by a solicitor a contention frequently occurs as to what clauses are to be introduced into it, whether there shall be a deposit, whether there shall be a power of rescinding in case of inability, what evidence of identity and what recitals shall be deemed conclusive—one solicitor strikes out what another would pass without a comment. There is no certain rule or guide.

The popular outcry against the system of conveyancing is directed more against the delay than the expense involved in every ordinary sale. The Land Registry Act, although a stillborn infant of the legislature, was a sincere but ill-advised scheme to remedy some of the existing defects of our conveyancing system. Into the causes of the failure of that Act it is not my province to enter, nor do I feel called upon to discuss the spirit with which it was introduced, the extremely exaggerated statements made, or the disappointed hopes of those who thought that a new era was to dawn upon the landholding public, and that conveyancing counsel and solicitors might close their chambers and their offices. I confine myself to a much humbler flight, and if I do not soar with Icarian wings I shall have at any rate a gentler fall.

We are here met to discuss subjects which affect the welfare of the profession in no selfish or self-aggrandizing spirit. The welfare of the profession and the public good are inseparably connected. It requires some faith in things not seen, and it is difficult to believe that what is apparently a discouragement and blow, is to work ultimate benefit.

No system or practice which involves the performance of unnecessary work, which those in the secret know, but the public do not know to be unnecessary, and which is designed for the benefit and enrichment of a class, can escape ultimate abolition. At some time or other the secret will come out, and it is better that, so far as they are able to understand them, the public should be let into the meaning of the rites and ceremonies. Viewing it in the aspect of an entertainment for which they pay, admit them behind the scenes, and show them the bolts of the trap-doors from which demons arise, and into which, at the bidding of the enchanter, they disappear; and let them see the blue fire which illumines the apotheosis of the incarnation of virtue.

Even assuming for argument's sake that the profession is a loser by any proposed reform, it is a moral wrong not only to prevent it, but even not to initiate it. To offer oneself as a sacrifice for the public weal may not be agreeable, but it is certainly right.

I quote from an article in the Law Magazine for May, 1859, on recent attacks on titles, in which the writer observes that the effect of the then pending land bills on the profits of solicitors or counsel ought not to be dragged into the question. To take, he says, first, the lowest ground of protest against such an unfortunate line of opposition, we would say it is inexpedient in any body of men to put forward such a line. Is it likely to attract or disgust the client public to see the legal body complaining of a particular measure, because it will prevent them from deriving large emoluments from the pockets of those who employ them? It proceeds to say that such an opposition would lead the House of Commons to consequences the opposite of those wished for, and that if the public could do without lawyers, it would be perfectly justifiable to set about abolishing courts of law, turning Lincoln's-inn into a "recreation-ground," and Gray's-inn into a "penitentiary;" and that it would be as right for the medical profession to seek for the propagation of disease, the surgical instrument maker to claim a vested interest in corporeal deformity, and the police in crime.

It may be said that while the profession should not oppose beneficial reforms, it is not wise to originate them, and that it is a foolish dog which supplies a stick to its own back. At any rate it is a good dog if it knows it deserves it.

I have incidentally referred to the exaggerated statements made as to conveyancing difficulties. Lord Cairns, when Solicitor-General, said that a purchaser cannot get possession until after a long lapse. "Sometimes no inconsiderable portion of a man's lifetime is spent in the preparation of abstracts, the comparison of deeds, and in searches for incumbrances. Not only months but years frequently pass in a history of that kind, and it is an uncommon thing for a purchase of any magnitude to be completed in a period under at all events twelve months."

All here must know that this is a gross exaggeration. An eminent conveyancer, whose practice was extensive, said, "It is known to all lawyers conversant with such matters that the average time between a contract and the completion of the contract in England under the present system does not exceed three months." But even this three months' average is certainly more than it need be, and it is precisely for the exceptional cases, and, what is of great importance, giving confidence to the public, that one would wish to legislate.

I now refer back to the imaginary conversation, and shall fix upon two salient points in it. First. That Mr. X., the purchaser's solicitor, is a man who will give a great deal of trouble. Secondly. That in an open contract he has it in his power to do so. I shall then proceed to suggest a remedy for each evil.

The cause of the difficulty and delay which so frequently occur in the settlement of a purchase, if expressed in a few words, is "Requisitions on Title." Of course, when used in the sense of difficulty and delay, I mean only the abuse of them. They are necessary, but in general practice they are pushed to an absurd and injurious extent. Moreover there is no settled rule. Every gentleman engaged in the practice of the law knows that with one solicitor or one firm, there will be nothing pressed or insisted on but what is absolutely essential for the protection of the purchaser; but that, even when sales are made under guarded and special conditions, with other solicitors or firms, there will be an amount of bickering and contention, which is calculated to do anything rather than benefit the client of either. In an action or suit, ill-temper or sharp practice can be generally kept in check by an appeal to the judge in some interlocutory manner, but in the contentions on requisitions there is no tribunal which can be appealed to. Mr. X. says that such an omission is a defect in title, that a section of a particular statute does not apply, that the concurrence of beneficiaries is absolutely essential, and while they are battling for victory, until one is laid hors de combat, either by judicial decision, by the opinion of counsel, or by the common sense of his client, who wants the property conveyed and the matter settled, the purchase-money is lying idle, and both vendor and purchaser are inwardly cursing the law's delays, and calling for a root-and-branch reform of the practice of conveyancing. Even where the solicitor is himself free from blame; and has placed the question of approving a title in the hands of counsel, the same contest is often carried on; and if a junior of acute and penetrating intellect has discovered a defect which has escaped the attention of, or better still has been thought nothing of, by a Dart or Joshua Williams, the pertinacity with which he sticks to his point, apparently in the hopes that at one jump he may attain the eminence of either of those gentlemen, is pardonable by every one but the unfortunate client whose purchase-money is waiting in the cold at his bankers.

He must be a bold and sanguine man who takes up requisitions in title without a qualm, lest some ingenuity has hit a blot which previous investigators have failed to discover, and which many years' enjoyment have failed to cure.

There is another class of requisition-mongers a curse to the profession and the public; the haggler who selects the requisitions which it is of no importance to comply with, in order that he may get those which he cannot strictly insist upon, or in the hopes of getting compensation. This kind of contemptible huckster is full of professions as to a desire to meet you in a spirit of fairness, and to avoid litigation. He will not insist upon strict proof of the death of the late Duke of Wellington, if you will not exact from him payment of £10 interest which has been accumulating while he was preferring his trumpery objections and absurd quibbles.

Then there is the timid man, who thinks that if he passes a point in a title which is not conclusively proved just as he has reached the independence and ease earned by years of toil, a regiment of injured clients will come upon him for negligence, and will embitter his declining years by mauling him in damages for loss sustained by his oversight.

Unfortunately, as a justification for the conduct of many solicitors, the present practice both of courts of equity and law fosters in an undue degree the liability of vendors to make out a title spotless in its purity, and fortified by documentary evidence regardless of expense. The owner of a plot of building ground at a festive dinner might enter into bargains which would involve him in costs exceeding the value of his property, and the Court of Chancery would feel called upon to order compliance with the insatiable and rapacious demands of the solicitors of the proposed grantees. In the eye of the law every purchaser is looked upon as an innocent babe, and every vendor much as a street Arab is by a pawnbroker to whom he has brought a diamond ring. In fact the hands of the courts are against him. If he sells under special conditions he is a probable knave, and conditions are to be construed quite contrary to their meaning, on the principle of omnia presumuntur contra stipulatorem. If he sells under an open contract, the court charitably looks upon him as a fool, who means well but who, not having guarded himself by special conditions, is a fit subject to be subjected to attested copies, statutory declarations, &c., in endless profusion.

Is there a remedy for all this? To some extent the remedy lies with the profession, the members of which may rest assured that sooner or later the public will step in to protest against an abuse which has the effect of making a sale of land a work of danger, difficulty, and protracted suspense.

Let the members of the professions look upon requisitions on title as a means of detecting real defects, and of asking for explanations where explanation is required, but let them not convert them into a scourge and a nuisance.

Another rule which solicitors should observe is, that if there is a defect in title they should keep it to themselves as much as possible. There is that amount of honour in the profession that they will not mention a defect, or, if they do, they can explain what it is, whereas a disappointed purchaser who has not had all his own way, or has been some way thwarted, will go up and down the country proclaiming that a title is bad, something very bad, in fact, so bad that he could not buy it.

But while trusting that solicitors will observe mutual forbearance on the subject of requisitions, there is a remedy which I have to propose, which is outside of and paramount to the presence of honourable feelings of a profession which will always contain men who are the slaves of their weaknesses or passions of avarice, timidity, vanity, stupidity, or roguery, or any of those numerous affections of mind which are the chief motives of the practice of pushing requisitions on title to an excessive extent.

The remedy is the intervention of the Legislature which is called upon to interfere whenever evils have progressed so far as to render the practice of the law a disgrace to the constitution, or to cause the stern and pure figure of justice a slave to routine instead of a mistress and queen.

One remedy I would propose against requisitions unduly pressed is, that by legislative enactment a Court of Equity should have power to compel a purchaser to complete his purchase on an indemnity being given against any supposed defect; and that in the event of its being of opinion that the supposed defect or omission was one which ought not to have been insisted on, or of an offer of an adequate indemnity being declined, it should saddle the person making the unfounded requisition or refusing to accept an adequate indemnity, with all costs incident to the dispute. As the law now stands, Courts of Equity are unable to compel the vendor to give or the purchaser to give an indemnity, even if it should be of ten times the value of the matter to be indemnified against.

It seems, moreover, that there should be no great difficulty in getting the decision of some competent authority in any question to which the dispute between a vendor and a purchaser has become narrowed, without the necessity of going through the form of a bill for specific performance being actually filed. The cumbersome and dilatory procedure, which is threatened by an exasperated vendor, viz., a bill for specific performance, in which a reference as to title will have to be made, and the whole question of title will be gone into, although there may be only one point actually in dispute, should be in some way got rid of. In suggesting some means of settling the disputes which constantly occur between vendor and purchaser, it would be necessary to guard against making it too cheap and easy a tribunal, or the unhappy public might find themselves on many sales in a state of quasi litigation which would certainly not ameliorate their condition.

Having with some confidence suggested that the practice of sending in requisitions on title should by the common consent of the profession be very much modified and toned down, and with some diffidence pointed out two remedies for the embarrassing position in which the solicitors of both parties often find themselves, I turn to the subject of "Open contracts." It is highly probable that not five per cent. of the sales which take place, are carried out without a formal contract containing special stipulations, but even such a per centage as five is quite enough to call for some protection being afforded to the vendor; and the fact of a formal contract being necessary must have the effect of preventing a readiness to buy and sell real property in the same manner as other saleable commodities. For the protection of the vendors and in the interests of the public and the profession, I am strongly of opinion that a simple device would have a most beneficial effect, and that by statutory enactment what is adopted in at least ninety-five cases out of a hundred should be applied to the unprotected five. If it appears there is any hardship on purchasers, let it be remembered that by the common consent of the profession, and with the sanction of the Court of Chancery, in sales carried on under its direction, the special conditions I shall mention are introduced.

Several Acts have of late years been passed enacting that certain instruments shall be deemed to contain provisions which are usually inserted. I allude more particularly to Lord Cranworth's Act.

I would apply the principle of that Act to the contract of sale of real estate by private treaty, and I would suggest that all written contracts for the sale of real property shall be deemed to comprise the following stipulations:—

That the sale shall be completed if no other time is named at the usual quarter-day succeeding the date of the contract, being not less than six weeks from the date, and the place of completion be the solicitor's office, with the usual proviso as to receipt and possession and payment of outgoings.

The usual clauses as to the delivery of the abstract.

Requisitions not sent in within fourteen days to be considered as waived.

As to misdescription and compensation, recitals being evidence.

Journeys for examination of deeds, procuring evidence, and production of deeds not in the possession of vendor.

Retention of muniments of title by vendor as relating to property retained.

As to preparation of conveyance and execution by vendor.

As to payment of interest from date of completion.

In case of leaseholds non-liability to produce lessor's title, and payment of rent being conclusive evidence of performance of covenants.

Last, but by no means least, that if any objection or requisition shall be made which the vendor shall be unable to remove or comply with, he shall be at liberty to rescind on paying the purchaser his costs of investigating the title, to be taxed if required, or at his option of paying the purchaser a low sliding scale of per-centage on the value of the property.

This clause introduced will be the most important of any, and will protect vendors from a grievous hardship, not only of having their property thrown back on their hands with a stain on the title, but of being mulcted in heavy payments quite disproportioned to the value of the property. The obligation on the purchaser to deliver his costs for taxation will also prevent the perpetration of the rascality which I have known committed (incredible as it may seem) of a purchaser bringing an action for damages, without first giving any particulars of his demand. It was for a long time undecided whether a purchaser could not recover damages for the loss of his bargain; but as it now seems finally settled that he cannot, and, as observed by Justice Williams in the case of Pounsett v. Fuller, 4 W. R. 323, 25 L. J. C. P. 145, "one cannot help feeling, whatever was the principle that the rule was one called for by the position of the parties. The position of the vendor of a real estate is difficult enough as the law now stands. His title may be supposed to be perfectly good until submitted to the scrutiny of some conveyancer for the purchaser, who applies all his experience and all his skill to pick holes in it. If a flaw is discovered it is quite sufficient punishment for the vendor in addition to his misfortune, to have to pay the expense of detecting it without being subject to the risk of a jury taking into their consideration the goodness of the bargain which the purchaser may suppose he has lost from the undervalue put upon the estate by the vendor himself, and the result of which might be, the vendor would not only have the misfortune of finding that he had bargained to sell his estate under its value, but that he had to pay several thousand pounds in addition. I must say it would be an unwholesome state of the law if that were so."

The clause (which in sales by auction is extended to unwillingness to comply with requisitions) will very materially affect the views of purchasers on the subject of requisitions. I think some penalty, though not a heavy one, should be inflicted on a vendor who ought to have some knowledge of the state of his title for his omission to remember the legacy left him by some former investigator, that on selling it will be necessary to guard against some particular defect. To carry this out, I suggest a low sliding scale of per centage on the value of the property.

The exact wording of the clauses would, of course, require careful consideration; and it is quite possible that many other useful provisions might be added to those I have enumerated.

It will, of course, be open to either party or their advisers to exclude the operation of the statute, or to modify its application in any contract. It will enable parties to make their own contracts without fear and trembling, and it must to a great extent cause an increase in the number of sales, and consequently the work to be done by solicitors in carrying out the business subsequent to the contract. This will more than compensate for the loss (if that is a fair element in the consideration of the subject) caused by the diminished number of contracts to be prepared.

I have throughout written solely in the interests of vendors, but every solicitor in fair practice is as likely to find himself ranged on the side of a purchaser as of a vendor, and it is always with much more pleasure that a professional man hails the acquisition of a new property by a client than parting with an old one. The question for the consideration of the profession is are the plans suggested such as to impede purchasers in entering into contracts. I think no solicitor in case a client of his was in treaty for a purchase would dissuade him from purchasing under these statutory provisions, lest he should run the chance of something more stringent and objectionable being forced upon him by the vendor's solicitor.

MANCHESTER LAW ASSOCIATION.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE for the year 1870. Presented to the Adjourned Annual Meeting held on Thursday, the 10th February, 1870.

In consequence of an unusual expenditure during the last year, and the investment of accumulated dividends on stock, amounting to £113 8s. 6d., the treasurer's accounts shew a balance in hand at the close of the year, of £7 9s. 6d., only. The amount of consols has, however, been increased to the sum of £872 12s. 3d., which, together with the sum of £24 5s. 6d. for dividends thereon, is held in trust for the association.

The industry of a reformed Parliament during the last session added 117 acts to the Statute Book.

Of the bills which received the attention of your committee and passed into law, the only ones which need special mention, are the following:—

The Bankruptcy Act, 1869; The Debtors Act, 1869; The Bankruptcy Repeal Act, 1869. These bills were referred to the consideration of a sub-committee, and after the many recent unsuccessful attempts at bankruptcy legislation the progress of the present important measure towards completion was watched with considerable interest. Copies of a report of the sub-committee, advocating the formation of district county courts for bankruptcy purposes in commercial centres, on a plan similar to that provided by the "County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868," were forwarded to the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General, with an intimation that if necessary a deputation from your association would attend in order to enforce the views expressed in the report.

The 79th clause of the Act appears to confer on the Lord Chancellor power to carry into effect the suggestions contained in the report.

After the passing of the Act, and in co-operation with the Birmingham and other law societies, your committee memorialised the Lord Chancellor, under the powers of the 130th section, not to transfer the business pending in the Manchester District Court of Bankruptcy to the London court, or to any county court, but to continue one of the registrars in office for a limited period in order to wind up the business. An order to that effect has since been issued.

The Lord Chancellor having directed a copy of the draft rules proposed to be made in pursuance of the Act, and on which its character greatly depended, to be submitted for their opinion, the same were carefully considered by your committee, who prepared various observations and suggestions upon them, which were forwarded, in due course, to the proper quarter.

Debts of Deceased Persons Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 46). This Act abolishes the distinction, as to priority of payment, which recently existed between specialty and simple contract debts, so far as relates to the administration of estates of persons dying on or after 1st January, 1870, and provides that all creditors shall be treated as standing in equal degree, and be paid accordingly out of the assets, whether such assets are legal or equitable.

The Bills Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 38), enables all persons empowered to take affidavits under 29 Car. 2 to take bail and recognizances, and to exercise all the powers given for such purposes by 4 W. & M. and 1 & 2 Vict.

Among the bills which did not become law, the one which most nearly concerns the interest of our branch of the profession, is

The Attorneys and Solicitors Remuneration Bill, which was introduced, at the instance of the Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool, by Mr. Rathbone, at the close of the last session, in order to be brought forward in the next.

Mr. Rathbone intends to reintroduce the bill in the ensuing session, and it is now under the consideration of your committee.

The Married Women's Property Bill, which proposed to enable married women to hold property, contract, sue, and be sued as femes soles, appeared to your committee to be bad in principle, as well as loose in the terms in which it was expressed, but as they considered the objections to the bill rather matters of public policy than questions for the interference of the association, your committee did not take any steps in opposition to the bill, which after having been referred to a select committee by the House of Commons was not proceeded with.

Salford Hundred Court of Record.—One of the earliest subjects which engaged the attention of your committee, after the amalgamation of the two courts of record had taken effect, was the question of certifying for costs in actions under £10, as to which the practice varied. A deputation from your association attended in London upon Messrs. West and Kay, the judges of the court, upon the subject. The deputation believed that the conference would have a good effect in producing uniformity of action in the judges.

Common Pleas at Lancaster Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 37).—In the last annual report the committee had the pleasure of congratulating the association upon the accomplishment (in the amalgamation of the courts of record) of an object which had been desired by it for many years; they have now the satisfaction of recording the attainment of another object which has received the attention of the association for a period of almost equal length, namely the establishment, at Manchester, of a district registry for the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster. Their satisfaction on this head, is, however, greatly lessened by the fact that Lord Dufferin, the Chancellor of the Duchy, appointed to the office of District Prothonotary, Mr. Lowry, a Queen's Counsel of the Irish Bar; a gentleman who, whatever his other attainments may be, had not had the opportunity of acquiring that special familiarity with what is technically called "practice," which your committee consider to be of paramount importance in a district prothonotary.

In accordance with a resolution of a special general meeting, a memorial was adopted and presented by a deputation to Lord Dufferin, who, however, after some correspondence, declined to cancel the appointment.

Your committee acted in concert with the Liverpool Society in preparing the rules for the government of the practice of the court, a copy of which was sent to each member of the association.

Your committee can only regret that, for the reason indicated, the district court is not, at present so useful as was anticipated.

Judicature Commission.—On the publication of the first report of the Royal Commission, a copy was sent to each member of the committee, and the report subsequently received their consideration. The extent and importance of the recommendations of the Commissioners are now generally known; the leading features being the proposed blending of the Superior Courts of Law and Equity, together with the Courts of Probate, Divorce and Admiralty, into one court, under the title of the "Supreme Court." This court to be divided into chambers, or divisions, for the despatch of business, as convenience may require. Your committee are, at present, of opinion that any practical suggestions on the scheme should be reserved until the bills by which the Government propose to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners are before the association.

The Liverpool Law Society having obtained from the Lord Chancellor an appointment to receive delegates from various law societies, in reference to certain bills which he intended to introduce into Parliament, for the purpose of carrying out the recommendations of the Judicature Commission, Mr. Baker, who was in London at the time, was good enough to act as the representative of your association, and with gentlemen from other associations attended an interview with the Lord Chancellor, in the course of which his Lordship explained the nature of the bills he intended to introduce, one of which would refer to the formation of a High Court of Justice, which he proposed should be invested with full power to draw up all the rules which might be necessary for the working of the court. The second bill would deal with appeals, and would be confined to proceedings in the House of Lords, and would provide for the same persons hearing appeals from the commencement. His Lordship referred to the county court questions, which had been issued by the Judicature Commissioners, upon which they were most desirous of having the opinions of the profession, and which are now under consideration.

Legal Education.—In the early part of the past year, the Executive Committee on Legal Education submitted the draft of a scheme for the foundation of a University of Law, and invited the concurrence of this association, and the attendance of a deputation from it at a meeting to be held in London.

Most of the large towns throughout the kingdom had representatives at the meeting in London, at which a representative from your association also attended, and a series of resolutions was adopted, the main one of which was in favour of the establishment of a central law university, for the education of students intended for both branches of the profession. Sir Roundell Palmer has accepted the office of president, and on his recommendation, it is proposed that the Crown should be moved to grant a charter for the intended legal university, and that a subsidiary bill should be introduced into the House of Commons, for the purpose of removing such legal impediments as might exist to the accomplishment, by the authority of the Crown alone, of the whole object in view. Your committee attached so much importance to this movement, and the high influence it will have upon both branches of the profession, that they voted £50 from the funds of the association towards the expenses of the education committee.

Courts of Justice Site.—On the introduction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's bill for the acquisition of a proposed new site, on the Thames embankment, for the erection and concentration of the Courts of Justice, your committee presented a petition to the House of Commons against the bill, and in favour of retaining the Carey-street site, and the honorary secretary wrote to the local members of Parliament requesting their influence in opposing the proposed change. The question of the rival sites was referred by the House of Commons to the consideration of a committee, who reported in favour of Carey-street. The point still remains unsettled, and in the meantime all progress towards concentration is suspended.

Denoting Stamps on Duplicates.—The attention of your committee having been called to the recent change in the character of denoting stamps, which instead of certifying (as formerly) that the original is "duly stamped," now only indicates that the original bears stamps of a certain value, your committee wrote to the Board of Inland Revenue pointing out that the present mode of stamping was not, in their opinion, a compliance with the provisions of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, which directs a denoting stamp to be affixed for the purpose of "testifying the payment of the full and proper stamp duty on the original deed," and calling attention to the serious questions to which the change would give rise. This letter, and the reply of the Board, were afterwards embodied in a case laid before Mr. Manisty, Q.C., who advised that the new denoting stamp is not such a particular denoting stamp as is required by the Act. The case, with Mr. Manisty's opinion, was forwarded to the Commissioners, who stated in reply that they did not see any reason for altering their view of the propriety of the change, which had been adopted "because it was found that the use of the former stamp was not in strict conformity with the law, and involved considerable anomaly and injustice."

Fees for Exhibits in Bankruptcy.—Your committee finding that a fee of 1s. for marking each exhibit in bankruptcy is allowed by the Taxing Master in Bankruptcy, passed a resolution recommending the members to charge that fee, and a copy of the resolution was sent to every member of the association.

Death of Edward Owens, Esq.—On the death of Mr. Owens the judge of the Manchester County Court, your committee passed a resolution of sympathy and condolence with Mrs. Owens, a copy of which was forwarded to her, and acknowledged in grateful terms.

Presentation to Mr. Baker.—The sum of £50 having been voted by the last annual meeting for the purchase of plate, to be presented to Mr. Baker in acknowledgment of his services in connection with the amalgamation of the courts of record, the articles selected were presented to Mr. Baker, in the name of the association, by the president, on the occasion of the annual dinner.

The Preliminary Examinations have, as heretofore, been held in Manchester during the past year, under the conduct of members of your association, recommended by the committee for the purpose.

The Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association held their annual provincial meeting at York in the month of October, when your association was represented, as usual, by a deputation, who were received with the greatest courtesy and hospitality by the Yorkshire Law Society and the local members of the profession.

Incorporation of the Association.—Your committee have recently had under consideration the propriety of your association obtaining the advantage of a legal status, a perpetual succession and a common seal, by being incorporated under the 23rd section of the "Companies' Act, 1867," as has already been done by the now "Incorporated Law Society of Liverpool." Your committee, on enquiry, found that the process would be simple and inexpensive, and they consider that the association would thus gain considerably in weight and influence. It may be observed that by the proposed scheme for the Law University, the Senate will comprise a representative selected by each of four principal provincial law societies who shall thus have become incorporated. Your committee having come to the conclusion that incorporation was desirable, appointed a sub-committee to prepare the draft of the memorandum and articles of association, and the resolutions necessary to alter the constitution of the association, with a view to submitting the question to an early special general meeting of the members.

The following gentlemen were elected the officers and committee of the association for the ensuing year:—President, Mr. M. Bateson Wood; Vice-Presidents, Mr. R. G. Hinnell and Mr. G. F. Wharton; Treasurer, Mr. James Street; Honorary Secretary, Mr. S. Unwin; Chairman of Committee, Mr. W. H. Guest; Deputy-Chairman, Mr. James Bond. Committee, Messrs. J. P. Aston, Thomas Baker James Barrow, J. F. Beever, James Bond, Thomas Clave, R. B. Cobbett, John Cooper, R. D. Darbshire, W. H. Guest, J. N. K. Grover, T. Grundy (Grundy & Coulson), S. Heelis, Thomas Holden, Thomas Jepson, Francis Marriott, J. F. Milne, H. W. Parker, W. H. Partington, J. B. Payne, John Peacock, John Ponsonby, Richard Radford, George Taylor, George Thorley, J. L. Vaughan, W. L. Welsh, E. Whitworth, G. B. Withington, and Percy Woolley.

LAW STUDENTS DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on the 8th inst., Mr. Hepburn in the chair, the following question was discussed: "Should the minority clauses in 'the Representation of the People Act, 1867,' be repealed?" Mr. Lamb opened the question in the negative, and after a discussion, in which thirteen members took part, the society decided the question in the negative by a majority of six. Two gentlemen were elected members of the society; the number of members present was twenty-three.

SURREY LENT ASSIZE.

ENTRY OF CAUSES.

Causes can be entered provisionally at the office of the Clerk of Assize for the Home Circuit, in London, on Monday, the 14th March, and daily thereafter until Saturday, the 19th March, inclusive, between the hours of ten and two.

They will be formally entered and put on the list at Kingston by the Clerk of Assize, in the order of their provisional entry, and before causes entered at Kingston.

In case any record entered in London be withdrawn before the opening of the commission at Kingston, the entry stamps will be returned.

A list of causes for trial each day will be sent to London in the evening of the previous day, and will be affixed outside the porter's-lodge, Serjeants'-inn, Chancery-lane, and also outside the office of Mr. Abbott, the Under Sheriff, No. 8, New-inn, Strand, as soon as possible after the list can be arranged.

The first day's list will not extend beyond the 20th common jury in the list of causes provisionally entered, should there be so many. The list of causes provisionally entered may be seen at the London office of the Clerk of the Assize.

No cause will be allowed to be entered under any circumstances after the sitting of the Court.

This arrangement may not apply to future Assizes.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Consols were dull this week until the settling day, when a slight scarcity of stock in the market occasioned a rise of ½; this, however, was not maintained. Foreign securities began with firmness, but are now merely inactive. Favourable traffic returns kept the railway market very firm until this day, when it gave way; Caledonians, however, remain steady, it being anticipated in the market that the dividend to be shortly declared will be a good one. The late move of the Erie "ring" in New York, of "not permitting" transfers of shares with which the Protection Committee has anything to do, and confiscating such shares, if necessary, is succeeded by a bolder "plant"—that of obtaining from the Legislature an Act to enable the bondholders to foreclose and so squeeze out the shareholders.

Mr. T. R. Hill, High Sheriff of Worcestershire, entertained the members of the local bar, and several of the city officials, at a banquet at the Star Hotel, Worcester, on the 8th March, on the occasion of the opening of the Lent Assizes.

A monument has been erected in Worcester Cathedral to the memory of the late Mr. Edward Corles, attorney-at-law, and an alderman of the city, who died on the 7th May, 1866, at the age of fifty-four years. It consists of a Gothic tablet, on the upper portion of which is represented, in basso-relievo, the scene described in the parable of the Good Samaritan.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.—The Hon. Baron Pigott will preside at a meeting of the Law Amendment Society on Monday next, at eight o'clock, when a paper will be read by Mr. Joshua Williams, Q.C., on the Real Estates Intestacy Bill.

'The Solicitors' Journal.

LONDON, MARCH 19, 1870.

WE ARE INFORMED that Vice-Chancellor Sir W. M. James has kindly consented to preside at the thirty-eighth anniversary dinner of the United Law Clerks' Society, on Friday, the 27th day of May next.

WHEN, ON THURSDAY NIGHT, the report of the Committee on the Naturalization Bill was brought up before the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor proposed to strike out the whole of clause 8, which provided for the cancelling, under certain circumstances, of certificates of naturalisation or repatriation, and the proposal was agreed to. The omission of this clause, to which we objected (ante, p. 390), will strengthen the bill. A proviso suggested by Lord Westbury was also added to clause 3. (Vide our Parliamentary report.) This proviso substantially adopts the principle of the Royal Commission by providing machinery by which the child of an alien father, who from being born within the British dominions, is at common law a natural born subject, can become an alien. The Royal Commission, however, contemplated that this should be done by the act of the parent; whereas the bill gives the power to the child when of full age, but only if he became at his birth, and is at the time of the declaration, a subject of another state by the law of that state.

THE BILL NOW PENDING to facilitate the execution and acknowledgment of deeds of married women, after reciting in a long preamble the provisions of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57 as to acknowledgment, proceeds to repeal them in toto from 31st October next, except of course as to matters then begun and inchoate. In future the deeds are to be acknowledged before a judge of the Superior Courts at Westminster or any perpetual commissioner or commissioner to administer oaths in chancery or special commissioner, but the only formality necessary will be the endorsing of a memorandum upon the deed by the commissioner. The bill is rather clumsy, but the expense of taking acknowledgments required lessening.

SINCE THE LATE DECISION in Laing v. Reed (18 W. R. 76), the subject of advances made to building societies has engrossed considerable attention, especially as some building societies have been carrying on a heavy deposit account business. The recent decisions on the subject must effectually check such business, unless the high interest sometimes given should tempt depositors to lend where they have very small power of enforcing repayment. We lately made some remarks on the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in the case of the Victoria Permanent Society of Birmingham. The subject has also received some elucidation by the decision of Lord Justice Giffard in the case of Re National Permanent Benefit Building Society (18 W. R. 388), in which his Lordship appeared to be of opinion that, in the absence of a special rule, it is ultra vires for a building society to borrow at all (which, as regards temporary accommodation, is a length to which we are hardly prepared to go).

His Lordship further held that where money had been borrowed from depositors, the borrowing being ultra vires, the lenders were not entitled, as creditors, to a winding-up order, and he distinguished the Cork and Youghal Railway Company's case (18 W. R. 26), on the ground that the advances made to the building society were not applied in the discharge of any debts which had been recoverable from the society. He guarded himself from denying the right of the creditors to proceed by bill.

SOME OF OUR READERS will perhaps be interested in perusing the exact terms of the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the now celebrated "legal tender" case of Hepburn v. Griswold. In another column we print the judgment of the Court as delivered by Chief Justice Chase, abridged from an authentic report published in the New York Daily Transcript. The facts of the case are very short:—The Act of Congress of 25th February, 1862, authorised the issue of notes, and further enacted that such notes should be "lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States," except import duties and interest due on bond or note to the United States. The Supreme Court, in their decision delivered by Chief Justice Chase, decide that though Congress might lawfully direct the issue of such notes, it was ultra vires the powers limited to Congress by the Constitution, to enact that such notes should be a legal tender in payment of debts existing at the date of the Act. The decision amounts in brief to this: (1) The "legal tender" enactment includes existing debts; and (2) that being so it is an "unreasonable" enactment.

The reasoning by which the first position is attained is as follows:—Strictly and literally the word "debts," as used in the Constitution, means existing debts (1 St. Cons. § 921), and no others: that construction, however, is obviously inapplicable, since the Act must ex necessitate be at least prospective; but it is conclusive against its not being retrospective. And the exception of interest and import duties points the same way. Lastly, when the bill was in debate it was never suggested that it did not extend to existing debts.

On the second question, whether the Act, when so construed, is ultra vires, the Court say as follows:—The legislative power of Congress is only that granted by the Constitution. The judiciary, in adjusting the rights of individuals inter se, only declares and enforces the law: it may, however, in discharge of this duty, be called upon to consult the Constitution and examine whether any law is or not consistent therewith. Acts are always presumed to be intra vires unless the contrary is clearly proved. If upon a fair construction the Act cannot be reconciled to the Constitution it must give way. But authority may be implied as well as express. Does this "legal tender" enactment fall within the auxiliary and incidental powers appertaining to the administration of the powers expressly granted? These implied powers were in the Constitution limited, not without apprehension, to mean powers "bonâ fide appropriate to" "a legitimate end." The power to make notes legal tender is distinct matter from and has no necessary connection with the power to issue them, and the Court consider that the constituting these notes such a legal tender was not an appropriate means to the carrying on of the war, and did not in fact render any service. They hold that the connection is too far-fetched. Further, they hold that to interfere to such an extent with rights under existing contracts is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution as evidenced by proceedings in the Convention which agreed upon the Constitution, and by the prohibitions which the Constitution has laid upon individual States, though not expressly upon the United States. True, that bankruptcy laws interfere with existing contracts; but the power to make bankruptcy laws is express.

From this view three of the judges of the Court dissent, holding that the "legal tender" clause was a serviceable and appropriate means for the carrying on of the war, and that it is not in conflict with the spirit of the Constitution.

This question of ultra vires, if not a nice one, is one which involves an inquiry into the Constitution of the United States and the history of that Constitution, upon which we have no desire to enter. Certainly as far as the "merits" are concerned, our sympathies are against the State interference with existing contracts. It seems to us that it was quite open to the Court to hold that on the general principles on which legislative enactments are construed, the Act must be construed as not retrospective—i.e., not including tenders in payment of existing debts. What had been described in one of the reports cited as the "painful duty" of disallowing the Acts of the Legislature would thus have been avoided—if it is considered a thing to be avoided. The reasons in support of the retrospective operation, including the application of a passage in Story's Constitution of the United States, appear to our judgment far-fetched. Either way, however, the decision would have been equally distasteful to the upholders of the legal tender.

Such cases as this mark the difference between the position of the English and American judiciary in regard to the Legislature. It really amounts to this, that in England the Legislature is supreme, and in America the judges. The English judges interpret the laws made by the Legislature, but the American judges decide whether or no the Legislature has the power to make them. Parvis componere magna, the Acts passed by Congress are to the Constitution of the United States as the General Orders under the Companies Act, 1862, are to the Companies Act, 1862, itself; and the "legal tender" enactment has now been held to be ultra vires the body commissioned by the Constitution to legislate, just as the 26th rule under the Companies Act was held to be ultra vires the judges entrusted with the framing the General Orders under that Act. The difference is between a Constitution definitely invented and a Constitution which grew up, no one knows exactly how. With us the suprema potestas is irrefragably vested in the Sovereign and the three estates of the realm in Parliament, and there is no verbal constitution to interpret. It is curious to observe in this case the Court aiding its interpretation of an Act by reference to what happened in Congress during the progress of the bill, a method of interpreting statutes which our own Courts have always expressly disclaimed—e.g., in the Alexandra case.

WE HAVE JUST HAD the pleasure of perusing a grotesque paper printed recently in a contemporary "family journal of instruction and recreation," which provides Sunday reading for the nursery, and is published under the auspices of the Religious Tract Society, with the motto—

"Behold in these what Leisure Hours demand Amusement and true knowledge hand in hand."—Couper.

The paper is headed "Lawyers and Law Charges," and exhausts its topic in the following scathing fashion:—

"Clients would not be far to seek who . . . would tell us that to engage the services of the profession is to lay yourself open to endless expenses—to pay down hard cash in return for labours of an undefinable, unintelligible sort—to barter your independence and peace of mind in exchange for sundry verbose documents, a few shreds of red tape, and the privilege of being puzzled by the repulsive phraseology of legal writings. . . .

Solicitors' charges coming to the client in detail, are as perplexingly disgusting, especially when the client finds, as he is very likely to find, that conversations which were incidental talk, or gossip over a glass of wine, are set down as consultations to be paid for. Some charges made by lawyers are fixed at a scale which cannot be justified by any show of argument—the very sight of them so outraged the moral sense of the celebrated Thelwall that he threw up the profession in disgust, rather than submit to become the agent of such extortion—[&c.] . . . The rate at which lawyers' bills grow and swell is something astounding; the old tavern legend, "Sixpence to look at the waiter," is more than realised in the case of the lawyer. So long as you litigate you never see your legal friend without being charged a fee; nay, more, if he calls to see you and you are not at home, the fee is the same—and, worse still, should you call to see him and find him absent, you even run the risk of being charged for your own loss of labour, through the fact of your having called being entered by the clerk in the day-book. We have seen lawyers' bills extending over 'quires of foolscap (the sort of paper, we submit, best fitted for the purpose), and thick enough to bind up into an average folio volume; and we have known them paid, too, to the tune of near a thousand pounds, for suits undertaken at the lawyers' instigation, and which suits, as the instigators well knew, could only succeed in bringing profit to the lawyer."

After this it is pleasing to hear that the distressed writer has "one consolation, though it is a doubtful one." That consolation lies in the fact that lawyers' bills may be taxed:—

"The fact is profoundly significant, and should not be lost sight of. In all other dealings between man and man, buyer and seller are left to conclude their own transactions, but it is not so with lawyer and client. The lawyer, it seems, cannot be trusted to deal fairly with his customer: 'See to it,' says the Legislature, 'a dishonest lawyer has you in his power; bring his account to the taxing-office, and the taxing-officer will prevent your being plundered.' If this is not the plain English of the matter, we should like to know how else to phrase it."

There is a page and upwards more of this odd production, part of which is scarcely intelligible, unless on the hypothesis of its being a laborious though unsuccessful essay at humorous composition, a style in which it would be unfair to expect the Religious Tract Society to shine. These "impossible passages of grossness" are, however, sufficiently funny in themselves for any purposes of Sabbath entertainment; but it is not fair to borrow, without acknowledgment, an idea from Theodore Hook's Jack Brag, nor can we hold that this sin is atoned for by a quotation from Scripture which we find in another passage. On the whole, as a piece of comic Sunday reading, we think this will hardly be understood by the little people for whom it is intended, though it may, perhaps, amuse some of their elder male relatives, especially if any instigator should happen to peruse it while resting on the Sunday from labours of the undefinable, unintelligible sort. It is instructive also as illustrating the views entertained by the Religious Tract Society on the subject of Christian charity.

WE TAKE THE FOLLOWING from the Daily News:—

Yesterday afternoon, towards the close of the business at the Sheriffs' Court, a solicitor, addressing the judge, said he appeared in the case of — v. —. He, with his client and witnesses, had been waiting all the morning, and he should be glad if that case could be taken next.

Mr. Commissioner KERR.—It has been called on and disposed of nearly two hours ago.

The Solicitor.—It has not been called on while we have been in the court. During the hearing of that jury case the court was so crowded and the stairs so blocked up that we found it impossible to get near the entrance of the court.

Mr. Kerr.—I cannot help you; it was called on after the jury case.

The Solicitor.—And we tried all we could to get into the court immediately, but it was downright impossible to get up the stairs. We were in the waiting-room below. There ought to be better accommodation.

Mr. Kerr.—I grant you that, and I have done all I possibly can to obtain it. I have suggested that this space on my right should be filled up, but I have been met with all sorts of objections and difficulties.

The Solicitor.—But you are presiding here; and it is your place to see that there is proper arrangement and facility for people to get into the court.

Mr. Kerr.—Ah, that is just where you and the public are mistaken. I have not the jurisdiction; yours is not the only case. This want of proper accommodation is a matter of constant complaint, it is a question for the public. I do not know whether a public expression of opinion will do any good or not, but I have done all in my power to remedy the evil; you might do some good by writing a letter to the Lord Mayor.

The Solicitor.—But your proceeding with the business, without giving people time to get into the court, when you could see people all rushing out, is a mere farce of justice. Why do you not have an officer to keep the passage clear?

Mr. Kerr.—I grant you it is a very great hardship, but I tell you I have done all I can.

The Solicitor.—Why, there is not even an usher near the door to call the names outside. I say it is a most infamous perversion of justice to carry on business in this manner.

Mr. Kerr.—You can move for a new trial if you like, under the plea that you were accidentally prevented from attending the court.

The Solicitor.—That is no satisfaction for the expenses of witnesses and loss of time. We had better have nothing to do with such a court as this.

The parties then left the court.

It is a very singular thing and a very unhappy thing that the Sheriffs' Court should so persistently maintain its character for disorder and inconvenience. The physical disadvantages consist principally in the fact that the only access to the one door of the court is up a staircase and along a lengthy and not over broad passage, through which, when crowded, it is impossible to force your way with any reasonable quickness. The results are obvious, when coupled with a short and sharp manner of calling one cause after another. In any other court some amelioration would probably have been arranged; but, unfortunately for suitors and practitioners in the City Court, Mr. Commissioner Kerr and the city authorities are persistently at loggerheads: Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi. The late Mr. Justice Hayes, while making Baron Surributter describe his progress through the limbo of departed lawyers and litigants, put into his mouth a very moving description of appropriate punishments awarded in that inferno. We feel tempted to wish that Mr. Commissioner Kerr and the city authorities could be disembodied and set down to expend themselves in vain struggles with a shadowy crowd of disappointed parties in the passage of a ghostly Sheriffs' Court, in which Minos and Rhadamanthus, as Commissioners, should be ever on the point of giving judgment against them in default of appearance.

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE AND APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILLS.

The bills for the establishment of the High Courts of Justice and Appeal, which we noticed by anticipation a fortnight ago, have been at last produced and printed. They are of considerable importance, and will require, in some respects, a very careful scrutiny, and we hope to have an opportunity of remarking on them at some length before the House of Lords goes into committee on them. At present we are obliged to confine ourselves to a short résumé of the principal provisions.

Taking the two bills together,—it is proposed to concentrate all the jurisdiction at present exercised by any of Her Majesty's Courts of first instance or appeal, and that of the High Court of Admiralty, in two courts, to be called respectively "The High Court of Justice" and "The High Court of Appeal," which are to consist of not more than twenty-seven judges in all (the present staff of the courts to be superseded being, including the two vacant seats, twenty-eight), of whom five are to be exclusively occupied with appeals, seventeen to be judges of the High Court of Justice only, and the remaining five (the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and three judges annually selected) to be judges of both courts. It would seem, however, to be intended that the Lord Chancellor, though expressly constituted Lord President of the High Court of Justice, and also divisional Lord President of Chancery, should not in fact, ordinarily at any rate, sit in that Court; at least, we cannot otherwise account for the fact that while express provision is made for the performance by the Lord Chief Justice and the selected judges of their duties as judges of the High Court of Justice, no such provision is made in the case of the Lord Chancellor; while, on the other hand, all the appellate jurisdiction in chancery now vested in him is taken away, and vested in the High Court of Appeal.

The Court of Justice is to consist of five divisional courts—viz.: First, Chancery; to consist of the Lord Chancellor as President and four Vice-Chancellors (one of whom is also to perform the duties of Chief Judge in Bankruptcy). Secondly, Queen's Bench; to consist of the Lord Chief Justice and four puisne judges. Thirdly, Common Pleas; to consist of a Lord President (the first Lord President to be Lord Chief Justice Bovill) and four (or five) puisne judges. Fourthly, Exchequer; to consist of a Lord President (the Lord Chief Baron being the first) and five (or four) puisne judges. And fifthly, Probate, Divorce and Admiralty (for which we trust some less un-couth title will be devised); to consist of a Lord President (Lord Penzance being the first) and two puisne judges, of whom Sir R. Phillimore is to be one, and the other is to be transferred from the existing lists either in the Common Pleas or Exchequer. We would have thought it better to transfer one judge from each of these courts, thus making the three Common Law Divisional Courts consist of five judges each, and giving four to the fifth Divisional Court; instead of leaving one of the former with an extra judge, and confining the latter to three, a paucity of judicial strength which will be seriously felt if at any time one of those three judges should be "selected" for the Court of Appeal.

The quorum for a sitting of the High Court of Justice is to be seven, of a divisional court three, but as the Act authorises any single judge to exercise all the jurisdiction of the High Court, the object of these limitations does not appear; probably the rules to be made under the Act will explain this. All proceedings are to be commenced in the High Court, and the judges are to have unlimited power of transferring proceedings from one divisional court to another, and the Court is to be bound to assimilate its procedure in all its divisions "so far as is possible."

The High Court of Appeal is to sit in three divisions, and a quorum for a division is to be three; but a quorum for a sitting of the Court itself is to be five. As in the case of the Court of Justice, it is left to the contemplated rules to determine what business is to go before a division, and what before the Court itself; there does not, however, seem to be any appeal from one to the other. In the case of the Court of Justice, on the contrary, it would seem, from section 5 (though it is not very clear), that there is to be an appeal from any judge to his divisional court, and from any divisional court to the High Court itself, the decisions of this court being again subject to appeal to the High Court of Appeal. We fancy, however, that this cannot have been intended, and that the rules, when issued, will prevent so serious an increase of possible litigation. In this respect the author of these bills seems to have followed closely the precedent of the Attorney-General's Bankruptcy Act of last year, and to propose to transfer all legislative power in matters of detail from Parliament to the Courts: in fact, they may be described as "Bills to authorise General Orders."

The provisions respecting the "general precedence" of the judges in the two bills do not seem quite consistent, and it is not clear whether the ordinary judges of appeal are intended to rank before or after the three junior Lords Presidents of the High Court. If before them, the 5th clause of the Appellate Bill is unintelligible; if after, this is inconsistent with the 7th clause of the Court of Justice Bill, which says that the puisne judges of that court shall rank immediately after the junior Lord President. Moreover, if the appellate judges are to rank after the Lords Presidents, who are not judges of appeal, this will perpetuate the anomaly which was considered so objectionable in the case of the Master of the Rolls.

There are some other points in these bills which seem to call for remark (for instance, we can see no reason for limiting the salary of the judges of appeal to a sum the same as that of the puisne judges of first instance, and actually lower than that of the Lords Presidents, whose decisions are subject to reversal by those very judges), but we are compelled to defer the further investigation of them till another opportunity.

We must, however, add a few remarks upon another point. The last section of the bill deals with the proposed abolition of the Home Circuit. It is probably intended to be a mere draft, to be moulded into shape in Committee, but certainly some expressions in it would lead one to suppose that the draftsman was not very well acquainted with his subject. After declaring that from the commencement of the Act the Home Circuit shall be abolished, the section goes on thus—"And all civil and criminal cases which, if this Act had not been passed, would have been triable in the City of London shall continue triable there, and all other civil and criminal cases which would if this Act had not been passed, have been triable at any place on the Home Circuit, other than Westminster, shall be triable at Westminster?" This, of course, implies that Westminster is now a place on the Home Circuit, a mistake which we should have supposed no one could fall into. Further, it implies that something in the Act would have prevented cases otherwise triable in London from being tried there, which we have not been able to discover. These, however, are mere slips of language which do not prevent the intended scheme from being intelligible. The result will be that the place of trial for all local actions arising in the counties of Hertford, Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Surrey, will be Westminster. As regards all transitory actions which of course form the bulk of civil actions, the parties may, as hitherto, try where they please, but they will not have the choice of going to one of the assize towns in the Home Circuit as hitherto. They must go to Westminster or London, or a town on one of the circuits which are to remain unaltered. As regards criminal cases, cases arising in those parts of the home counties which are within the district of the Central Criminal Court, will be tried there as hitherto; while cases from the more distant parts of the country will be brought to Westminster. The advisability or economy of trying at Westminster a burglary committed, for example, at Chichester or Sandwich must be at least doubtful; still it is obvious that this is what is proposed. The section goes on to provide for two courts of the High Court sitting throughout the year, under rules of court to be made for the purpose, to dispose of cases within their cognisance; and this means of course that the details of the scheme are to be settled by rules. It is, however, noticeable that there has been no enactment to transfer the cognisance of the cases formerly tried on the circuit by virtue of commissions issued for each circuit, and which are now to be triable at Westminster, to the High Court. We are left in ignorance whether the judges are to try these cases by virtue of commissions to be issued to them from time to time, or by virtue of their offices as judges of the High Court. It is also worth notice that there is no mention of what always appeared to us the great difficulty of bringing all this business to Westminster—viz., how the juries are to be provided. Are persons living in the five counties to escape serving on juries altogether, and is the whole burden to be thrown on Middlesex juries? Or if not, are persons living in the more distant parts of these counties to be liable to serve in rotation with the Middlesex jurors, and without any allowance for the necessary expenses of sleeping in town?

Of course no mention is made in the bill of the matter to which we recently referred—viz., the effect upon the regulations of the bar of the abolition of the Home Circuit. This, of course, must be dealt with, if at all, by the bar themselves. It will be necessary, however, to provide for the case of the officers of the circuit, such as the clerk of assize and his associates, which is not done at present.

THE FRENCH "HIGH COURT" AND PRINCE PIERRE BONAPARTE'S CASE.

On Monday next, at Tours, will begin the trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte before the High Court (Haute Cour); and the following particulars concerning the offence for which he is indicted and the Court before which he is to be tried will, perhaps, be interesting. Habent sua fata libelli; courts have likewise their destinies, and those of the High Court of Justice in France have been strange. Established by the Republic it has become part of the State machinery of the Empire. Created by the Republic as a protection against the autocratic tendencies of a ruler, it became one of the defences of the victorious coup d'état. Strange to say, since the Constitution of the 4th November, 1848, which established it, together with the Presidency of which Prince Louis Napoleon was to make so effectual a stepping-stone, it has been called into operation but four times, including the present. On two of these occasions the defendant has been a Napoleon.

The first appearance of a High Court among the judicial institutions of France was in the Constitution of Year III. It was instituted for the judgment of such accusations as might be authorised by the Legislative Body against its members. It was abolished by the Senatus Consultum of the 28th Floréal, Year XII., and in its place was put the High Imperial Court, which never existed excepted on paper. The Charter of the Restoration prohibited the creation of any such exceptional jurisdiction for the future. The Chamber of Peers, however, in some cases was used substantially for the same purposes of political prosecution. The republican Assembly of 1848 thought fit to remove that obsolete institution, and had no Court of Peers to dispose of State crimes of high caste. But it seems to have been anticipated that the President of the Republic might attempt what he subsequently did, and accordingly a court was provided for such contingencies. This the republican Assembly did in the Constitution of the 4th November, 1848, by which they sought to regulate and fortify the republican institutions prepared by the Provisional Government brought into power by the Revolution of February. The article 91 of that Constitution is to the following effect:—

"A High Court of Justice shall judge, without appeal or recourse of Cassation, the accusations brought by the National Assembly against the President of the Republic or the ministers. It shall likewise judge all persons whom the National Assembly shall have sent before it accused of crimes against the outward or internal safety of the State. Except in the case provided for in article 68, it can be called into action only by a decree of the National Assembly, which shall name the town in which the Court shall hold its sittings."

"The case provided for in article 68" is stated in the following terms:—

"Every measure by which the President of the Republic dissolves the National Assembly, prorogues it, or prevents the fulfilment of its duties is a crime of high treason. By the mere act, the President forfeits his function, the citizens are bound to refuse obedience to him, the executive power passes by the operation of the law to the Legislative Assembly; the judges of the High Court of Justice shall immediately assemble under penalty of treason, they shall call the jury in the place they shall choose, to judge the President and his accomplices; they shall themselves name the magistrates who shall fulfil the duties of public prosecutors."

Such were the duties and the objects of the High Court of Justice under the Republican Constitution of 1848. We may now turn to the Constitution of the 14th January, 1852, that given by the President after the coup d'état, after he had done the deed which was to bring into play the redoubtable paragraph in Article 68 just quoted. Article 54 of this Constitution runs as follows:—

"A High Court of Justice judges, without appeal or recourse of Cassation, all such persons as shall have been sent before it as charged with crimes, treasons, or plots, against the President of the Republic, or against the internal or external security of the State."

The rod having changed hands, had now got into the hands of the party for whose regulation it had been prepared. As a check on what have been termed Napoleonic tendencies it had not proved very successful. Up to this time the Court had been twice set in motion—viz., against the vanquished and prostrate enemies of the 15th of May and 13th of June, whom any ordinary Court could have consigned to Cayenne or to prison equally well.

After the coup d'état the judges of the High Court were in an awkward position. The old clause made them guilty of treason if they did not spontaneously commence a prosecution against a President who should dissolve the Assembly, and yet the defendant might prove a victor. They managed to steer between Scylla and Charybdis. They came together, and to save themselves from Article 68 they gave a decree of accusation against the President, of which certain intrepid members of the Assembly vainly attempted to take advantage; and to save themselves from the victor and secure his favour they adjourned to a day which was never to come.

Thus the case of Prince Pierre Bonaparte is the fourth in which the machinery of the Haute Cour de Justice has been set in motion.

Of the facts which gave rise to the prosecution against Pierre Bonaparte we will say nothing, but we may state shortly the legal character of the charge. We will first, however, explain the composition of this court; but previously we must not forget to state how the High Court in question can be called upon to try Prince Pierre Bonaparte, who occupies no official position, for an offence not political in its character. It is by virtue of article 1 of the Senatus Consultum of the 4th of June, 1858, enacted for the purpose of regulating and extending the jurisdiction of the High Court. By that article cognisance is given to the Haute Cour "of all felonies and misdemeanours (crimes et délits) committed by the Princes of the Imperial family and the family of the Emperor, by the ministers, by the great officers of the Crown, by the Grand Crosses of the Legion of Honour, by the ambassadors, senators, and counsellors of State," save such as come under the military law. This Court—which thus has universal and exclusive jurisdiction over every crime and misdemeanour committed by any member of the Imperial family, any one of the great officers of the Crown, any of the ministers or any member of the Senate,—is formed by Imperial choice. The Emperor selects yearly from among the judges of the Court of Cassation, ten members and four substitutes, who are to form the two chambers or sections of the Haute Cour. The business of one of those sections is to go through the preliminary procedure (instruction), and to find whether or not there is a case for the High Court. The other is the section of judgment, as it is called, for the trial of crimes or felonies. The latter is not, any more than the "Cour d'Assises" (the Court of Assizes which has common jurisdiction over felonies), complete without a jury. But it is not an ordinary jury, it is a high jury, as it is called by the law. It is drawn by lots. The first President of the Imperial Court wherever there is any, or failing him the President of the Civil Tribunal of the judicial chief towns of the department, draws in each department, one member of the General Council (Conseil Général) a body elected the people generally from among the magnates of the land, to watch over the finances of the department. Thirty-six is the number required to form a panel. A majority of at least twenty is requisite for a verdict of guilty and for one of "extenuating circumstances." While in the "Cour d'Assises" a majority of seven, one over the half of the panel is sufficient for the same purposes.

Such is the nature of the Court which is going to try Prince Pierre Bonaparte for "voluntary homicide of the journalist, Victor Noir," for that is the count of the indictment (if one can so call a decree of accusation) found by the judges of the section of accusation or instruction against him. The penal significance and gravity of that charge are aggravated by another, that arising out of the shots fired by the Prince against M. de Fonvielle, the companion of Victor Noir; and, vice versa, this attempt, which forms another count of the arrêt de mise en accusation, is aggravated by the accompaniment of the shot fired on Victor Noir. This is by virtue of article 304 of the Penal Code, which enacts that voluntary homicide without premeditation (meurtre) shall be punished with death where it has preceded, accompanied, or followed another crime. Otherwise, the penalty awarded to the same crime by the Penal Code is perpetual labour at the hulks (travaux forcés à perpétuité). A declaration of extenuating circumstances by the jury, however, would very notably reduce the penalty. And the presiding judge, if the facts brought out by the trial appear to him to warrant his doing so, has power to deviate from the questions in the indictment, and put the case to the jury under a mitigated aspect, such for example as "wounds which have caused death without the intention of causing it." The exercise of the right of the president, combined with a declaration of extenuating circumstances (which allows the Court to bring the penalty down two degrees), may in such a charge bring down the consequences to a mere nothing, especially if the prisoner pleads provocation, an excuse which per se has the effect of reducing the penalty.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

MISTAKE FAVOURED BY ACQUIESCENCE.

Landed Estates Company v. Weeding, V.C.M., 18 W. R. 35.

This is not a case which decides any new point of law, or even throws any new light upon any leading doctrines; but as it is illustrative of the disposition of the Court of Equity towards litigants who, though legally right, are morally wrong, it may serve as the peg whereon to hang a few remarks applicable rather to parties than to their legal advisers.

Though the Court of Equity is specially designed to admit defences and supply remedies ignored by the more rigid rules of common law, it does not pretend to give effect to every moral obligation. It is no part of its duty to enforce everything which is honest, much less everything that is proper. There are cases, however, in which, though compelled to award for a litigant on the subject-matter of the suit, it marks its sense of his conduct by refusing him costs, whereas a court of common law would have been bound by the strict common law rule that costs follow the event.

One principle acted on by the Court of Equity is that persons who stand by and allow others to commit themselves to liabilities in the belief that the acquiescences are going to do or permit some particular thing, will not be afterwards permitted to stand on their strict legal rights to the prejudice of those whom by such acquiescence they have induced so to involve themselves. The common illustration of this is the case of a man building a house on his neighbour's ground in the belief that it is his own; in which case the Court would not permit the true owner to stand by laughing in his sleeve at the mistake, and then when all was completed step in and profit by it, but would require him to compensate the other party for the loss he had by such culpable acquiescence led him into.

But it is, of course, a necessary ingredient of the case that there should have been a bonâ fide mistake on the one side, and on the other side a wilful acquiescence calculated to maintain the mistake in the mind of the party making it. For instance, if a tenant, under an erroneous impression that his term is to be renewed, lays out money on the land, the landlord is under no obligation to compensate him unless he is proved to have wilfully favoured the mistake (Pilling v. Armitage, 12 Ves. 85).

In an old case of Hardcastle v. Shafto (1 Anstr. 186) it was queried whether a lessor, by permitting and encouraging a defendant to make improvements under a lease which he knew to be bad, did not give him an equitable claim to a new lease. The same point was queried again in 1806 by Sir William Grant in Pilling v. Armitage.

In Blore v. Sutton (3 Mer. 237) a tenant for life had power to lease by deed; her agent entered into a parol agreement for a lease to the plaintiff, and a formal memorandum was made, but no lease executed. Plaintiff having entered and spent money on building, was, on the death of the tenant for life, ousted by the remainderman, who was not proved to have had any knowledge of what had previously passed. The plaintiff's bill for specific performance was dismissed, with the observation that the mishap seemed attributable to the plaintiff's own negligence, but the Court, disapproving of the idea of defendant's appropriating plaintiff's work without making any compensation, gave no costs.

The present was a very similar case; the decision proceeded on the ground that the plaintiffs had acted on an agreement made bonâ fide on both sides during the tenancy for life, but which was not binding on the estate, and which the remainderman repudiated; the Vice-Chancellor dismissed the bill but pointedly refused costs.

We imagine that, per contra, wherever the Court may award in favour of the mistaken party, the decree will similarly be made without costs as against the other party, on the ground that the resort to the Court has been necessitated by some laches on the part of the non-successful party.

Cases of this kind show that the Court of Equity does all in its power to incline parties rather to agree with their adversaries while they are in the way with them than to insist on rights which are theirs in law but not in honour.

REVIEWS.

A Treatise on the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and the Debtors Act, 1869, and the Bankruptcy Repeal Act, with the Rules and Orders under those Acts, together with an Introduction and Notes, and the Law of Private Arrangement with Creditors. By GEORGE SILLS, M.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge, and of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law. London: Davis & Son. 1870.

A Practical Guide to the Bankruptcy Law of 1869. By JOSEPH SEYMOUR SALAMAN, Solicitor. Third Edition. London: Groombridge & Son. 1870.

An Index to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the Debtors Act, 1869, the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869, and the Rules, together with a Table of Clauses. By THOMAS MARSHALL, Solicitor, Registrar of the County Court at Leeds.

The Student's Guide to Bankruptcy, containing all the Principal Questions and Answers in Bankruptcy of former Examinations of Articled Clerks, and also a Complete Series of New Questions, framed upon the Acts of 1869 and the Rules of 1870. By R. WAKEHAM PURKISS, Esq., Solicitor. London: William Amer. 1870.

These four books, which we have grouped together, are very different in form, and they are addressed to different classes of readers; but the object of them all is somewhat similar. They all attempt, not to expound the whole law of bankruptcy, either with reference to its principles or its practice, but merely to assist in the understanding of the late Acts.

Mr. Silla's book consists of an appendix of two hundred and fifty pages of small print, in which the late Acts, rules, and forms are set out, preceded by a treatise, filling seventy-three pages of large print, and followed by an index. That part of the book which is the work of the author, the treatise, seems to be accurate in statement, and will no doubt be found useful as an introduction to the study of the Act. But its very slight character will be at once apparent from its length. The index is good.

That Mr. Salaman's Guide should have already reached a third edition shows that it has been found useful. It states the substance of the new enactments in a very convenient form.

Mr. Marshall has produced a very full index to the Acts of last session relating to bankruptcy and kindred subjects, as well as the rules issued under the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. Purkiss' work is especially intended for articled clerks; and to such of them, indeed to such persons generally, as like to learn law in a catechetical form we can recommend this book.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

VICE-CHANCELLOR STUART.

March 16.—Richards v. French.

The defendant to this bill, Mr. William French, was a solicitor formerly in practice in Stamford, who, in 1854, married a Miss Mary Harrison, one of four children among whom their father, by his will, divided his property equally, settling his daughters' shares for their separate use in the usual manner, and appointing his eldest son one of his executors. The accounts of the father's estate were never settled, and on the death, in 1861, of the eldest son who had been sole acting executor, the arrears of income on Mrs. French's share were upwards of £2,000. Upon the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. French, her sister, Miss Elizabeth Harrison, went to live with them, and in 1861 the sisters executed cross wills in each other's favour. Mrs. French died in 1862, and on her death Miss Harrison, who continued to live with her brother-in-law until her own death in 1865, took out letters of administration to her sister's effects, the estate being sworn under £12,000, and Mr. French becoming one of the sureties of the administration bond. The bill was filed to set aside, on the ground of undue influence, two agreements entered into between Mr. French and Miss Harrison, the first dated the 12th of June, 1862, by which she made over the £2,000 arrears of his wife's income to him; and the other dated in June, 1863, by which, on the purchase of a house at Tulso-hill, it was conveyed in such a way that the survivor took a life interest in it.

Greene, Q.C., Hardy, Q.C., and Hemming, for the plaintiff; Dickinson, Q.C., and B. B. Rogers, for the defendant.

STUART, V.C., said Mr. French was a solicitor, and no doubt both before and after his wife's death he lived with his sister-in-law, who was her only sister, on terms of intimacy and confidence; but it was impossible to say that he had ever acted as her professional adviser: he was her adviser and brother-in-law, and had acted for her in matters in which they had a mutual interest, but he never acted as her attorney, he never made out a bill of costs against her, and in this very transaction another professional adviser intervened. It had been said that because Miss Harrison was in an infirm state of health, undue advantage was taken. It was impossible to say the arrangement was unfair on the ground of age; and, independently of this, the lady appeared at this very time to have been well able to take care of her own interests; for during the preparation of the conveyance of the house, when the conveyancer suggested the introduction of a clause that in case Miss Harrison married she should quit possession, she at once insisted on a similar obligation being imposed on Mr. French in case he took a wife. It was unlikely that any advantage could have been taken of this lady, who was shown to be of singularly acute and business-like habits. He was sorry the bill should ever have been filed, for the plaintiff had a mere legal title, and the costs would fall on children who had no voice in the institution of the suit, but it must be dismissed with costs.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

*Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 221—Prosecution—Costs.*March 17.—Re Feldman.

In this case the assignees had obtained an order for the prosecution of the bankrupt, jointly with one Davis, for offences under the 221st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861. Davis absconded soon after the order was granted, and, pending the proceedings against Feldman, the assignees were advised to prefer a further indictment against him for perjury. Upon the taxation of costs against the Chief Registrar's Fund, after the conviction of Feldman, objection was raised to the allowance of any costs in reference to the indictment for perjury, that not being one of the offences specified in the 221st section, and the Master disallowed them. The matter was now brought before the Court for his Lordship's direction.

Mr. Albert Turner, solicitor, contended that the costs might be properly allowed out of the Chief Registrar's Fund.

Mr. Aldridge, solicitor, appeared for the Chief Registrar.

The CHIEF JUDGE said the statute spoke for itself, and he could not go beyond it. The taxing-master was quite right.

Application refused.

March 17.—Re Clarke.Insolvency—Bequest to wife—Payment to her—Desertion.

This was an application on behalf of the wife of the insolvent F. Clarke, that a sum of £120, bequeathed to her by the will of her grandmother, dated in 1838, with interest thereon, making together £234 10s. 1d., should be paid to the applicant for her own absolute use and benefit, notwithstanding the insolvency of her husband.

The facts which gave rise to the application were briefly these:—In 1843 the insolvent married Eliza Maria Clarke, but no settlement or agreement for a settlement was executed. In 1845 the insolvency occurred, and soon afterwards the insolvent deserted his wife. In 1855, in consequence of a letter which the applicant received from her husband, she met him in Paris, but he again deserted her, and for some years she had been dependent upon her own exertions and the assistance of friends for support. She believed from a letter which she had received from Algiers that her husband was living in adultery with another woman. It appeared that in 1850, upon the death of her father, the applicant's interest in the sum bequeathed to her under the will of her grandmother, fell into possession. Her four brothers and sisters had received their respective shares in the fund, but the trustees refused to pay the applicant her share on the ground that she was a married woman, and that her husband had been insolvent. There was one child only now living of the marriage, a female, and she had recently attained her majority.

Finlay Knight in support of the application, said this was a very strong case in favour of the wife, and, no settlement having been executed upon the marriage, he trusted his Lordship would see his way to an order by which she might receive the benefit of the fund. The interest upon the money, if invested, would be very inconsiderable.

Mr. Twyford, solicitor, for the provisional assignee.

The CHIEF JUDGE at first thought some difficulty existed, and asked what would become of the fund if he made an order for payment to the wife, but after some consideration, he consented to grant the order upon the written assent of the daughter. The costs of the provisional assignee must, of course, be paid by the applicant.

Solicitor, W. A. Brown.

March 11.—Re Beavis.Form of notice of motion.

In this case the notice of motion did not state whether the matter would be heard before the Chief Judge at the court in Lincoln's-inn-fields, or at the court in Basinghall-street.

The CHIEF JUDGE said it would be convenient to state in notices of motion before whom, and where it was intended to make the motion. If a mistake should occur by reason of any omission in this respect, the person giving the notice might be ordered to pay costs.

MARYLEBONE POLICE COURT,

(Before Mr. D'Eyncourt.)

March 16.—Mr. John Wilson Gray, barrister-at-law, of No. 9, Prince's-square, Bayswater, appeared in answer to a summons charging him with assaulting his servant, Susan Morris.

Poland conducted the prosecution on behalf of the governors of the Foundling Hospital, in which institution the prosecutrix was brought up.

Mr. Frederick Lewis, for the defendant, stated that he admitted the assault and desired to express his contrition for having in a moment of passion exercised what at the time he believed to be a right he had to chastise the girl as an apprentice, she having been impertinent. He had offered to pay the costs of the prosecution in order to show that he considered the proceedings had been properly instituted by the corporation.

Mr. D'Eyncourt said he could not deal with the case until the nature of the assault had been proved.

Susan Morris, sixteen years of age, was, therefore, called, and stated that she was bound by a deed of indenture as servant to the defendant's wife, and was under articles for four years. On the 24th of February a fellow-servant told her to light a fire, and she refused to do so, believing that this servant had been ordered to light the fire by their mistress. This circumstance was reported to Mrs. Gray, who told the prosecutrix to go into the billiard-room, where her master was lying on the sofa. He bade her get the cane, which was an ordinary stiff walking-stick, and when she had given it to him he told her to hold out her hand. She did so, and as he struck at her hand she withdrew it. This was repeated, and he then got up and beat her over the arms and shoulders, giving her, she thought, about half a dozen blows.—Two medical witnesses deposed to having seen the marks of the blows on the girl's person.—Mr. D'Eyncourt said that if he dealt with the case as a charge of common assault the ordinary penalty would not be sufficient to meet the justice of the case. He must, therefore, either inflict a more severe punishment or send the case for trial. The defendant, had, no doubt, acted under an idea that he had a right to correct the prosecutrix, but it was a monstrous thing to chastise a young woman as he had done. It was ultimately arranged that the defendant should give a sum of money, to be applied for the benefit of the prosecutrix, as compensation for the suffering she had endured, and that her indentures should be cancelled. The defendant was then ordered to pay a penalty of £5, and five guineas for costs.

APPOINTMENTS.

SIR RICHARD COUCH, Chief Justice of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, has been appointed to succeed Sir Barnes Peacock as Chief Justice of the High Court at Calcutta. Sir Richard was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in January, 1841, and formerly practised on the Norfolk Circuit. He was for some years Recorder of Bedford, but in 1862 was appointed a Puisne Judge of the Bombay High Court, entering upon office in August of that year. In April, 1866, on the retirement of the late Sir Matthew Sausse, he was promoted to be Chief Justice.

THE HON. MICHAEL ROBERTS WESTROPP, a Puisne Judge of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay, has been appointed Chief Justice of that presidency, in succession to Sir Richard Couch. Mr. Westropp has, on being promoted to the chief justiceship, been created a Knight of the United Kingdom. Sir Michael Westropp was called to the bar in Ireland in Trinity Term, 1840, and joined the Bombay Bar upwards of fifteen years ago, and soon acquired a large practice. In due course he became Advocate-General, and was appointed a Puisne Judge of the High Court in August, 1863. The salary of the Chief Justice of Bombay, to which post Sir Michael Westropp is now raised, is £6,000 a year.

MR. JOSEPH GRAHAM, Standing Counsel to the Government of India, has been appointed to officiate as Advocate-General at Calcutta, during the absence of Mr. T. H. Cowie, who has been granted leave of absence for six months. Mr. Graham was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in November 1852, and after practising for several years at Calcutta, he was appointed Standing Counsel to the Government of India, in succession to Mr. Cowie, on the latter becoming Advocate-General.

Mr. GREGORY C. PAUL, barrister-at-law, of Calcutta, has been appointed to officiate as Standing Counsel to the Government of India, vice Mr. J. Graham. Mr. Paul was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in June 1855.

Mr. THEODORE THOMAS, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Professor of Law at Canning College, Lucknow. Mr. Thomas was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1866, and soon afterwards became an advocate of the High Court at Agra.

Mr. JAMES BROUGHTON EDGE, solicitor, of Bolton, Lancashire, has been elected coroner of the Bolton division of the county, which has been newly formed. Mr. Edge was certificated in Easter Term, 1858, and was formerly deputy-coroner for the Salford Hundred.

Mr. WILLIAM FOWLE, solicitor, of Northallerton, Yorkshire, has been elected Clerk to the Northallerton Board of Guardians, in succession to the late Mr. Thomas Fowle. Mr. W. Fowle was certificated as a solicitor in Hilary Term, 1859, and was in partnership with his predecessor up to the date of his death.

Mr. DALTON THOMAS MILLER, Solicitor, of 5 & 6, Sherborne-lane, E.C., has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery in Ireland for the London district, comprising the cities of London and Westminster, the borough of Southwark, and the counties of Bucks, Essex, Hereford, Kent, Middlesex, Surrey, and Sussex, and also to take the examinations of witnesses in the courts of equity in Ireland for the above-mentioned districts.

Mr. WILLIAM THOMAS WEST, solicitor, of Market Deeping, Lincolnshire, has been appointed a Commissioner to administer oaths in Chancery.

Mr. EDWIN BEDFORD, of Haberdasher's Hall, Gresham-street West, has been appointed a London Commissioner to administer oaths at Common Law.

Mr. ROBY LIDDINGTON THORPE, of Nottingham, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgements of deeds by married women in and for the town and county of Nottingham.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

IGNORAMUS has not sent us his name and address.

THE COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—“An Indignant Registrar” in last week's Journal thinks that because he disapproves of my letter, you ought not to have inserted it, and adds that because I pointed out a few shortcomings of a few registrars, I slandered the whole body. Further on he says the practices I described do not exist in the courts known to him, therefore they do not exist at all. This sort of reasoning differs very little from that of Pat, who, in answer to a number of witnesses who swore to having seen him commit the offence with which he was charged, offered to produce ten times as many witnesses who would swear that they did not see him commit the offence.

As your correspondent seems in a state of happy ignorance on the subject of touting, apparently supposing that it consists of nothing more than going “about to the shopkeepers to urge them to issue summonses,” I will give him a recent experience of my own on the subject, just to show that touting takes various forms. A friend of mine who is town clerk of a small borough was recently ridiculing the mode in which registrars of county courts are paid. He said that a few days before the end of September, his friend, the registrar of the county court, called on him and said he was a few summonses short of the twenty-five which would entitle him to £5 extra salary; would the town clerk try and send him one or two as other friends had promised. “Well,” said the town clerk to me, “there are more expensive ways of putting a £5 note into a friend's pocket—lending him the money for instance—and the thing was done.” I suggested that the registrar might have issued a few dummy summonses, they would only cost a shilling each, and thus at a very small outlay he would have been independent of his friends. “Ah!” said my friend, “I don't suppose he thought of that.” I could only say that I knew registrars who had a good deal more than “thought of that.”

What does your correspondent mean by a “small extra fee under section 2.” There is a charge of 4s. for entering up judgment. Now, as judgment had to be entered up before the Act of 1867, and that operation was paid for by the salary received by the registrar, this 4s. is, therefore, clearly paid to him for doing nothing. If the registrar really deserves the money, why not pay him out of the same fund that his salary comes from, instead of empowering him to wring it from the pockets of poor defendants.

AN OLD HAND.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 14.—The Churchwardens Eligibility Bill passed through committee.

March 17.—The Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.—The second reading was postponed till after Easter, when the bishops would be able to attend.

The Naturalization Bill.—Report. Lord Westbury's proviso,—that any person who by reason of his having been born within the dominions of her Majesty is a natural born subject, and who at the time of his birth became by the law of any foreign State a subject of such State, and is still a subject thereof, may, if of full age and not under any legal disability, make a declaration of alienage, and thereupon shall cease to be a British subject—was added to clause 3. The omission of clause 8 (cancelling certificates of naturalization or repatriation) was also agreed to.

Lord Houghton thought the good working of the bill rested with ourselves and not on the co-operation of any foreign Power, and the less action taken in the matter by the Foreign-office the better.

The report was then received.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

March 11.—Secret Service Money.—Mr. Winterbotham and Mr. Henderson called attention to the following statement said to have been made by Lord Romilly in the House of Lords:—“No body of persons were so incompetent to perform judicial functions as committees of the House of Commons. Shortly after he had the honour of a seat on the bench, an eminent railway company having got into a dispute, he had to take the accounts in the Court of Chancery, when he found the item of £10,000 for secret service money paid to members of Parliament. Of course, he disallowed the item, but he was assured that the expenditure had been necessary. Now, the scandal occasioned by the discussion of such a question in court was a serious evil.”

Mr. Gladstone read the following extract from a letter from Lord Romilly to himself:—“I stated to the House of Lords that when the case came before me in court I stated my misbelief of any such sum having been paid, and I disallowed the item, but that I mentioned the circumstance in order to show the scandal that arose from the present system of private legislation.” Putting together the remoteness of the date and the learned Judge's disbelief of the allegation, he did not feel it his duty to take any proceedings in the matter.

The Vacancy on the Scotch Bench.—In reply to Mr. Craufurd, Mr. Gladstone said something must be done in the matter, because the court of session was overcharged with business; but as it would not do to bring down a judge of the inner court, although that court was not so fully occupied, the Government proposed to fill up the vacancy, subject to the condition that the person taking the office should abide by any rules and regulations Parliament might think fit to enact with reference to the arrangement of business.

The Irish Land Bill.—Adjourned debate on the second reading.—Mr. W. H. Gregory, though alive to many faults in the bill, shrank from delaying its progress.—Lord Elcho while pronouncing it good, on the whole, for Ireland, denounced its leading provisions as flagrant violations of political economy against landowners.—Sir Colman O'Loughlen thought it not perfect, but a fair compromise.—Mr. Chaplin thought it an objectionable piece of interference.—Mr. Cogan said it would confer immense benefits on the Irish tenant.—Mr. Downing said it would not satisfy them.—Mr. Disraeli, in the course of an amusing speech on most things except the bill, thought the interference justifiable. The Ulster custom could not and should not be defined. The advances for purchasers were objectionable. The proposed litigation machinery was ridiculous. He assented to the second reading, but did not approve the bill in toto, it being complicated, clumsy, and heterogeneous.—Mr. Gladstone having replied, the second reading was carried by a majority of 442 to 11, and the committee fixed for the 21st.

March 14.—Encumbered Estates Court (Ireland).—In reply to Mr. Wingfield Baker, Mr. Chichester Fortescue saw no reason for suspending sales till the Irish Land Bill should become law.

Dismissal of Captain Cooté from the High Shrievalty of Co. Monahan.—Viscount Crichton moved a resolution that this was an unconstitutional act, and calculated to impede the performance of public duty. Negatived by a majority of 193 to 113.

The Elementary Education Bill.—Debate on the second reading. Adjourned.

City of London Brokers.—Mr. W. Fowler introduced a bill to relieve the brokers of the city of London from the supervision of the Court of the Mayor and Aldermen of the city.

March 15.—The Elementary Education Bill.—Adjourned debate on the second reading. Adjourned again.

March 16.—The Game Laws Amendment Bill.—After some debate, the bill was withdrawn.

The Ballot Bill.—Mr. Leatham moved the second reading. After rehearsing the customary arguments, he urged that the Bribery Laws were wholly powerless. The election judges only buoyed out the course for the lawbreakers. The ballot was the only remedy.—The Marquis of Hartington said the Government would not oppose the second reading, but this was on the understanding that the next stage would be postponed till they could consider the report now presented by the committee of last session.—Mr. Hardy thought this a good plan.—Mr. Liddell thought secret voting was cowardly.—Mr. Bernal Osborne's experience convinced him that it was necessary.—Mr. Torrens' colonial experience convinced him also.—Sir G. Grey said the report had convinced him that the disadvantages would be outweighed by the advantages.—After some further discussion the debate was adjourned till May 3.

The Registration of Voters Bill was, on the motion of Mr. H. R. Brand, referred to a select committee "to inquire into the laws affecting the registration of Parliamentary voters in counties in England and Wales.

March 17.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—Mr. Chichester Fortescue introduced this bill. After reviewing the annals of agrarian crime in Ireland, which rendered such a measure expedient, he said the outrages had been more numerous and violent in the past year. He thought the executive had done all it could. He classed the provisions of the bill under three heads, according as they applied to districts proclaimed under the Act, to districts specially proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant for the purposes of the Act, and to the whole of Ireland. As to the first the exemption given by the possession of a game licence from the arms clauses of the Peace Preservation Act was to be abolished; a special licence would be required for the possession of revolvers, and the punishment for noncompliance would range from two years with hard labour to one year without. There would be powers to search for arms and for documents connected with threatening letters, by night as well as day, and no arms or ammunition were to be sold except to persons licensed to carry arms. Magistrates would have power to examine persons on oath and commit them for refusing to give evidence even where no one had been charged with an offence, and they would also have a discretion, which they did not now possess, vested in them to refuse bail. As to the second districts, persons found by the police out at night under suspicious circumstances might be taken before a magistrate, and if they could not give a satisfactory account of themselves they would be liable to be imprisoned for six months. Strangers also might be so dealt with and committed to gaol until they found security for good conduct. The Executive would have power to close publichouses after sunset, and also, on application to the Queen's Bench, to change the venue for any trial coming out of one of these proclaimed districts. In dealing with a certain class of offenders an option would be given to magistrates either to send them to trial or to commit summarily for not more than six months. Thirdly, in the whole of Ireland every sale of arms and ammunition must be registered, and grand juries, subject to the usual sanction, would be empowered to assess on any district or area compensation for the victim of any outrage, or his relatives. The most important provision gives the Lord Lieutenant power to seize the plant, &c., of any newspaper preaching treason and sedition, with this safeguard, that any person aggrieved may bring an action against the Crown, and recover damages if the Crown did not prove the newspaper to be of a seditious character.—Sir F. Heygate approved the policy of the bill and regretted that the same firm tone had not been adopted a year ago. He doubted whether grand juries should be trusted with the entire assessment of damages, and believing that a few honest convictions would do more than anything else to maintain the law, he suggested that the verdict of nine jurymen should be taken at criminal trials.—Mr. Conolly thought the bill inadequate for the occasion. He and his brother magistrates would be answerable for the peace of his county if the Habeas Corpus Act were suspended.—Sir P. O'Brien, Mr. Callan, and Mr. Downing, on the other hand, said such large powers should not be given to the magistracy unless it were first purged.—Mr. Gladstone said the bill would be read a second time on Monday, and pressed forward with speed. The point as to grand juries could be considered in committee; taking the verdict of a majority of the jury would cast an undeserved stigma on Irish juries. Any change ought to be of a permanent character and part of a general scheme. He gave expression to his deep regret at having to suspend the progress of the Land Bill for this measure.—Mr. Dowse recapitulated the main features of the bill, and leave was given to bring it in.

Gas and Water Facilities.—Mr. Shaw Lefevre introduced a Bill to facilitate, in certain cases, the obtaining of powers for the construction of gas and waterworks, and for the supply of gas and water.

Railways (Powers and Construction) Amendment.—Mr. Shaw Lefevre introduced a Bill to amend the Railway Companies Powers Act (1864) and the Railway Construction Facilities Act (1864).

Mortgage Debenture Act (1865) Amendment.—Mr. West introduced a bill.

Pawnbroking.—In committee of the House, Mr. Pimsoil introduced a bill to amend the laws relating to pawnbroking.

FOREIGN TRIBUNALS & JURISPRUDENCE.

AMERICA.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

Hepburn v. Griswold.

The Act of February 25, 1862, declaring that the notes whose issue is authorised should be a legal tender in payment of all debts—

Held to include existing as well as future debts, and on that account to be ultra vires the powers limited to Congress by the Constitution.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeals of Kentucky.

The plaintiff in the court below sought to recover of the defendants a certain sum expressed on the face of a promissory note. The defendants insisted on their right, under the Act of February 25, 1862, to acquit themselves of their obligation by tendering in payment a sum nominally equal in the United States notes; but the note had been executed before the passage of the Act, and the plaintiff insisted on his right, under the Constitution, to be paid the amount due in gold and silver. The Court of Appeals held—

1. That the defendants were not relieved by the Act from the obligation assumed in the contract.

2. That the plaintiff could not be compelled by a judgment of the court to receive in payment a currency of a different nature and value from that which was in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made.

The opinion of the Court was now delivered by CHASE, C.J.—The question presented for our determination by the record in this case, is whether or not the payee or assignee of a note made before the 25th of February, 1862, is obliged by law to accept in payment United States notes equal in nominal amount to the sum due, according to its terms when tendered by the maker or other party bound to pay it. And this requires, in the first place, a construction of that clause of the first section of the Act of Congress passed on that day, which declares the United States notes, the issue of which was authorised by the statute, to be a legal tender in payment of debts.

The entire clause is in these words: "And such notes herein authorised shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid (12th United States Statutes, 345)." This clause has already received much consideration here, and this Court has held that, upon a sound construction, neither taxes imposed by State legislation (Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wallace, 71), nor demands upon contracts which stipulate in terms for the payment or delivery of coin or bullion (Bronson v. Rodes, 7 Wallace, 299; Butler v. Horwitz, 7 Wallace, 258), are included by legislative intention under the description of debts public and private.

We are now to determine whether this description embraces debts contracted before as well as after the date of the Act. It is an established rule for the construction of statutes that the terms employed by the Legislature are not to receive an interpretation which conflicts with acknowledged principles of justice and equity, if another sense, consonant with those principles, can be given to them. But this rule cannot prevail where the intent is clear, except in the scarcely supposable case where a statute sets at naught the plainest precepts of morality and social obligation. Courts must give effect to the clearly ascertained legislative intent, if not repugnant to the fundamental law ordained in the Constitution. Applying the rule just stated to the Act under consideration, there appears to be strong reason for construing the word "debts" as having reference only to debts contracted subsequent to the enactment of the law; for no one will question that the United States notes, which the Act makes a legal tender in payment are essentially unlike in nature, and being irredeemable in coin, are necessarily unlike in value, to the lawful money intended by parties to contracts for the payment of money made before its passage.

Contracts for the payment of money made before the Act of 1862, had reference to coined money, and could not be discharged unless by consent otherwise than by tender of the sum due in coin. Every such contract, therefore, was in legal import a contract for the payment of coin. There is a well-known law of currency, that notes or promises to pay, unless made conveniently and promptly convertible into coin at the will of the holder, can never, except under unusual and abnormal conditions be at par in circulation with coin. It is an equally well-known law that depreciation of notes must increase with the increase of the quantity put in circulation, and the diminution of confidence in the ability or disposition to redeem. Their appreciation follows the reversal of these conditions. No act making them a legal tender can change materially the operation of these laws. Admitting, then, that prior contracts are within the intention of the Act, and assuming that the Act is warranted by the Constitution, it follows that the holder of a promissory note made before the Act, for a thousand dollars, payable, as we have just seen, according to the law and according to the intent of the parties, in coin, was required, when depreciation reached its lowest point, to accept in payment a thousand note dollars, although with a thousand coin dollars due under the contract he could have purchased on that day two thousand eight hundred and fifty such dollars. Now it certainly needs no argument to prove that an act compelling acceptance in satisfaction of any other than stipulated payment, alters arbitrarily the terms of the contract and impairs its obligation, in proportion to the inequality of the payment accepted under the constraint of the law to the payment due under the contract; nor does it need argument to prove that the practical operation of such an act is contrary to justice and equity. It follows that no construction which attributes such practical operation to an act of Congress, is to be favoured, or, indeed, to be admitted, if any other can be reconciled with the manifest intent of the Legislature. What, then, is that manifest intent? Are we at liberty upon a fair and reasonable construction of the Act, to say that Congress meant that the word "debts," used in the Act, should not include debts contracted prior to its passage?

In Bronson v. Rodes we held that this word as used in the statute does not include obligations created by express contracts for the payment of gold and silver, whether coined or in bullion. This conclusion rested, however, mainly on the terms of the Act, which not only allow, but require payments in coin by and to the Government, and may be fairly considered independently of considerations belonging to the law of contracts for the delivery of specified articles as sanctioning special private contracts for like payments, without which, indeed, the provisions relating to government payments could hardly have practical effect. This consideration, however, does not apply to the matter now before us. A strict and literal construction indeed would, as suggested by Mr. Justice Story, in respect to the same word used in the Constitution (1 Story on Constitution, sec. 921), limit the word "debts" to debts existing; and if this construction cannot be accepted, because the limitations sanctioned by it cannot be reconciled with the obvious scope and purpose of the Act, it is certainly conclusive against any interpretation which will exclude existing debts from its operation. The same conclusion results from the exception of interest on loans and duties on imports, from the effect of the legal-tender clause. This exception affords an irresistible implication, that no description of debts, whenever contracted, can be withdrawn from the effect of the Act, if not included within the terms or the reasonable intent of the exception. And it is worthy of observation, in this connection, that in all debates to which the Act gave occasion in Congress, no suggestion was ever made that the legal-tender clause did not apply as fully to contracts made before, as to contracts made after its passage. These considerations seem to us conclusive. We do not think ourselves at liberty, therefore, to say that Congress did not intend to make the notes authorised by it a legal tender in payment of debts contracted before the passage of the Act.

We are thus brought to the question whether Congress has power to make notes issued under its authority a legal tender in payment of debts which, when contracted, were payable by law in gold and silver coin. This Court always approaches the consideration of questions of this nature reluctantly, and its constant rule of decision has been, and is, that Acts of Congress must be regarded as constitutional unless clearly shown to be otherwise. But the Constitution is the fundamental law of the United States. By it the people have created a government, defined its powers, prescribed their limits, distributed them among the different departments, and directed in general the manner of their exercise. No department of the Government has any other powers than those thus delegated to it by the people. All the legislative power granted by the Constitution belongs to Congress; but it has no legislative power which is not thus granted. And the same observation is equally true in its application to the executive and judicial powers granted respectively to the President and the courts. All these powers differ in kind, but not in source or in limitation. They all arise from the Constitution and are limited by its terms.

It is the function of the judiciary to interpret and apply the law to cases between parties as they arise for judgment. It can only declare what the law is, and enforce, by proper process, the law thus declared. But, in ascertaining the respective rights of parties, it frequently becomes necessary to consult the Constitution; for there can be no law inconsistent with the fundamental law. No enactment not in pursuance of the authority conferred by it can create obligations or confer rights, for such is the express declaration of the Constitution itself, in these words:—

"The Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Not every act of Congress, then, is to be regarded as the supreme law of the land; nor is it by every Act of Congress that the judges are bound. This character and this force belong only to such acts as "are made in pursuance of the Constitution." When, therefore, a case arises for judicial determination, and the decision depends on the alleged inconsistency of a legislative provision with the fundamental law, it is the plain duty of the Court to compare the Act with the Constitution, and if the former cannot, upon a fair construction, be reconciled with the latter, to give effect to the Constitution rather than the statute. This seems so plain that it is impossible to make it plainer by argument; if it be otherwise the Constitution is not the supreme law. It is neither necessary nor useful in any case to inquire whether or not any Act of Congress was passed in pursuance of it; and the oath which every member of this Court is required to take, that he "will administer justice without respect to persons, and do equal right to the poor and the rich, and faithfully perform the duties incumbent upon him to the best of his ability and understanding, agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States," becomes an idle and unmeaning form.

The Government of the United States is one of limited powers, and no department possesses any authority not granted by the Constitution. It is not necessary, however, in order to prove the existence of a particular authority to show a particular and express grant. The design of the Constitution was to establish a government competent to take direction and administration of the affairs of a great nation, and at the same time to mark, by sufficiently definite lines, the sphere of its operations. To this end it was needful only to make express grants of general powers, coupled with a further grant of such incidental and auxiliary powers as might be required for the exercise of the powers expressly granted. These powers are necessarily extensive. It has been found, indeed, in the practical administration of the Government, that a very large part, if not the largest part, of its functions have been performed in the exercise of powers thus implied. But the extension of power by implication was regarded with an apprehension manifest in the terms by which the grant of incidental and auxiliary powers is made. All powers of this nature are included under the description of power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressly granted to Congress or vested by the Constitution in the Government, or in any of its departments or officers. The same apprehension is equally apparent in the tenth article of the amendments, which declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or the people." We do not mean to say that either of these constitutional provisions is to be taken as restricting any exercise of power fairly warranted by legitimate derivation from one of the enumerated or express powers. The first was undoubtedly introduced to exclude all doubt in respect to the existence of implied powers, while the words "necessary and proper" were intended to have a "sense," to use the words of Mr. Justice Story, "at once admonitory and directory," and to require that the means used in the execution of an express power "should be bond fide, appropriate to the end" (2 Story on Constitution, p. 142, sec. 1253). The second provision was intended to have a like admonitory and directory sense, and to restrain the limited government established under the Constitution from the exercise of powers not clearly delegated or derived by just inference from powers so delegated.

There is not in the Constitution any express grant of legislative power to make any description of credit currency a legal tender in payment of debts.

Can this be done in the exercise of an implied power? The rule stated in McCulloch v. The State of Maryland (4 Wheaton, 421), has ever since been accepted as a correct exposition of the Constitution:—"Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." In another part of the same opinion, the practical application of this rule was thus illustrated:—"Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not entrusted to the Government, it would be the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an Act was not the law of the land; but where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects entrusted to the government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and treads on legislative ground."

It must be taken, then, as finally settled, so far as judicial decisions can settle anything, that the words "all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution" powers expressly granted or vested, have in the Constitution a sense equivalent to that of the words, "laws not absolutely necessary indeed, but appropriate, plainly adapted to constitutional and legitimate ends—laws not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution; laws really calculated to effect objects entrusted to the Government."

Is the clause which makes the United States notes a legal tender for debts contracted prior to its enactment a law of the description stated in the rule? It is not doubted that the power to establish a standard of value, by which all other values may be measured, or, in other words, to determine what shall be lawful money and a legal tender, is, in its nature and of necessity, a governmental power. It is in all countries exercised by the government. In the United States, so far as it relates to the precious metals, it is vested in Congress by the grant of the power to coin money. But can a power to impart these qualities to notes or promises to pay money when offered in discharge of pre-existing debts be derived from the coinage power, or from any other power expressly given?

It is certainly not the same power as the power to coin money, nor is it in any reasonable or satisfactory sense an appropriate or plainly adapted means to the exercise of that power; nor is there more reason for saying that it is implied in or incidental to the power to regulate the value of coined money of the United States or of foreign coins. Nor is the power to make notes a legal tender the same as the power to issue notes to be used as currency.

The States have always been held to possess the power to authorise and regulate the issue of bills for circulation by banks or individuals, subject, as has been lately determined, to the control of Congress, for the purpose of establishing and securing a national currency, and yet the States are expressly prohibited by the Constitution from making anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender. This seems decisive on the point that the power to issue notes and the power to make them a legal tender are not the same power, and that they have no necessary connection with each other.

But it has been maintained in argument that the power to make United States notes a legal tender in payment of all debts, is a means appropriately and plainly adapted to the execution of the power to carry on war, of the power to regulate commerce, and of the power to borrow money. Congress has power to declare and provide for carrying on war. Congress has, also, power to emit bills of credit, or circulating notes, receivable for government dues, and payable, so far, at least, as parties are willing to receive them, in discharge of government obligations. It will facilitate the use of such notes in disbursements, to make them a legal tender in payment of existing debts; therefore, Congress may make such notes a legal tender.

It is difficult to say to what express power the authority to make notes a legal tender in payment of pre-existing debts may not be upheld as incidental, upon the principles of this argument.

The argument proves too much. It carries the doctrine of implied powers very far beyond any extent hitherto given to it. It asserts that whatever in any degree promotes an end within the scope of a general power, whether in the correct sense of the word "appropriate" or not, may be done in the exercise of an implied power.

It is said that this is not a question for the Court deciding a cause, but for Congress exercising the power. But the admission of a legislative power to determine finally what powers have the described relation as means to the execution of other powers plainly granted, and then to exercise absolutely and without liability to question, in cases involving private rights, the powers thus determined to have that relation, would completely change the nature of American government. It would convert the Government which the people ordained as a government of limited powers into a government of unlimited powers. It would confuse the boundaries which separate the executive and judicial from the legislative authority. Undoubtedly, among means appropriate, plainly adapted, really calculated, the Legislature has unrestricted choice; but there can be no implied power to use means not within the description.

[After recounting the history of American paper currency the Court proceeded]

The history of the legislation under consideration is, that it was upon the quality of receivability, and not upon the quality of legal tender, that reliance for circulation was originally placed; for the receivability clause appears to have been in the original draft of the bill, while the legal tender clause seems to have been introduced at a later stage of its progress. These facts certainly are not without weight as evidence that all the useful purposes of the notes would have been fully answered, without making them a legal tender for pre-existing debts. Now how far is the Government helped by this means? It cannot obtain new supplies or services at a cheaper rate, for no one will take the notes for more than they are worth at the time of the new contract. The price will rise in the ratio of the depreciation, and this is all that could happen if the notes were not made a legal tender. But it may be said that the depreciation will be less to him who takes them from the Government, if the Government will pledge to him its power to compel its creditors to receive them at par in payments. This is by no means certain.

If the quantity issued be excessive, and redemption uncertain and remote, great depreciation will take place. If, on the other hand, the quantity is only adequate to the demands of business, and confidence in early redemption is strong, the notes will circulate freely, whether made a legal tender or not; but if it be admitted that some increase of availability is derived from making the notes a legal tender under new contracts, it by no means follows that any appreciable advantage is gained by compelling creditors to receive them in satisfaction of pre-existing debts. And there is abundant evidence that whatever benefit is possible from that compulsion to some individuals, or to the Government, is far more than outweighed by the losses of property, the derangement of business, the fluctuations of currency and values, the increase of prices to the people and the Government, and the long train of evils which flow from the use of irredeemable paper-money. It is true that these evils are not to be attributed altogether to making it a legal tender, but this increases these evils. It certainly widens their extent and protracts their continuance.

We are unable to persuade ourselves that an expedient of this sort is an appropriate and plainly-adapted means for the execution of the power to declare and carry on war. If it adds nothing to the utility of the notes, it cannot be upheld as a means to the end in furtherance of which the notes are issued; nor can it, in our judgment, be upheld as such, if, while facilitating in some degree the circulation of the notes, it debases and injures the currency in its proper use to a much greater degree. And these considerations seem to us equally applicable to the powers to regulate commerce and to borrow money. Both powers necessarily involve the use of money by the people and by the Government; but neither, as we think, carries with it, as an appropriate and plainly-adapted means to its exercise, the power of making circulating notes a legal tender in payment of pre-existing debts.

But there is another view which seems to us decisive, to whatever express power the implied power in question may be referred. In the rule stated in Bronson v. Rodes, the words "appropriate, plainly adapted, really calculated," are qualified by the limitation that the means must not be prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Nothing so prohibited or inconsistent can be regarded as a means appropriate or plainly adapted or really calculated to any end. Let us inquire, then, first, whether making bills of credit a legal tender to the extent indicated is consistent with the spirit of the Constitution.

Among the great cardinal principles of that instrument, no one is more conspicuous or more venerable than the establishment of justice. And what was intended by the establishment of justice in the minds of the people who ordained it, is happily not a matter of disputation. It is not left to inference or conjecture, especially in its relations to contracts. When the Constitution was undergoing discussion in the Convention, the Congress of the Confederation was engaged in the consideration of the ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio, and the only territory subject at that time to its regulation and control. By this ordinance certain fundamental articles of compact were established between the original States and the people and States of the territory, for the purpose, to use its own language, "of extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, whereon these republics" (the States united under the Confederation) "their laws and constitutions are erected." Among these fundamental principles was this: "And in the just preservation of rights and property it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the said territory, that shall in any manner whatever interfere with or affect private contracts or engagements, bonâ fide, and without fraud, previously formed." The same principle found more condensed expression in that most valuable provision of the Constitution of the United State, ever recognised as an efficient safeguard against injustice, that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." It is true that this prohibition is not applied in terms to the Government of the United States. Congress has express power to enact bankrupt laws, and we do not say that a law made in the execution of any other express power, which incidentally only impairs the obligation of a contract, can be held to be unconstitutional for that reason.

But we think it clear that those who framed and those who adopted the Constitution intended that the spirit of this prohibition should pervade the entire body of legislation, and that the justice which the Constitution was ordained to establish was not thought by them to be compatible with legislation of an opposite tendency. In other words, we cannot doubt that a law not made in pursuance of an express power, which necessarily, and in its direct operation impairs the obligation of contracts, is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution.

Another provision found in the fifth amendment must be considered in this connection. We refer to that which ordains that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. This provision is kindred in spirit to that which forbids legislation impairing the obligation of contracts; but, unlike that, it is addressed directly and solely to the national Government. It does not in terms prohibit legislation which appropriates the private property of one class of citizens to the use of another class; but if such property cannot be taken for the benefit of all without compensation, it is difficult to understand how it can be so taken for the benefit of a part without violating the spirit of the prohibition. But there is another provision in the same amendment which, in our judgment, cannot have its full and intended effect unless construed as a direct prohibition of the legislation which we have been considering. It is that which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It is not doubted that all the provisions of this amendment operate directly in limitation and restraint of the legislative powers conferred by the Constitution.

The only question is, whether an act which compels all those who hold contracts for the payment of gold and silver money to accept in payment a currency of inferior value, deprives such persons of property without due process of law. Whatever may be the operation of such an act, due process of law makes no part of it. Does it deprive any person of property? A very large proportion of the property of civilised men exists in the form of contracts. Contracts in the United States stipulating prior to the Act under consideration, for the payment of money, were contracts to pay the sums specified in gold and silver coin; and it is beyond doubt that the holders of these contracts were and are as fully entitled to the protection of this constitutional provision as the holders of any other description of property.

But it may be said that the holders of no description of property are protected by it from legislation which incidentally only impairs its value. And it may be urged, in illustration, that the holders of stock in a turnpike, a bridge, or a manufacturing corporation, or an insurance company, or a bank, cannot invoke its protection against legislation, which, by authorising similar works or corporations, reduces its price in the market; but all this does not appear to meet the real difficulty. In the cases mentioned, the injury is purely contingent and incidental. In the case we are considering it is direct and inevitable. If, in the cases mentioned, the holders of the stock were required by law to convey it on demand to any one who should think fit to offer half its value for it, the analogy would be more obvious.

We are obliged to conclude that an act making mere promises to pay dollars a legal tender in payment of debts previously contracted, is not a means appropriate, plainly adapted, really calculated to carry into effect any express power vested in Congress, that such an act is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and that it is prohibited by the Constitution. We therefore, hold that the defendant in error was not bound to receive from the plaintiffs the currency tendered to him in payment of their note made before the passage of the Act of February 25, 1862.

MILLER, SWAYNE, and DAVIS, JJ., dissented; their opinion was that the "legal tender" clause was an appropriate means for providing funds wherewith to prosecute the war, and that it did materially assist that end, and that it was not in conflict with the spirit of the Constitution. They considered that while States were expressly forbidden to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts Congress, was under no such restriction.

OBITUARY.

MR. G. B. LENNARD.

George Barrett Lennard, Esq., barrister-at-law, died on the 4th March, at his residence, at Gipsy-hill, Norwood. Mr. Lennard was the third son of the late Sir Thomas Barrett Lennard, Bart., of Belhus, Essex, by his first wife, Dorothy, daughter of the late Sir John St. Aubyn, Bart. He was born on the 6th June, 1796, and was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in February, 1822, practising as a conveyancer for many years. Mr. Lennard married, in 1820, Elizabeth, eldest daughter and co-heir of Edmund Prideaux, of Hexworthy, Cornwall, by which lady he had a son and three daughters. The deceased gentleman was an uncle of the present Sir Thomas Barrett Lennard, Bart., who married a daughter of the late Rev. Sir John Page Wood, a niece of the Lord Chancellor, and also of Mr. St. Aubyn Lennard, barrister-at-law, of the Inner Temple, now practising at Melbourne. His father, who died in 1857 at the advanced age of ninety-six years, was the testamentary heir of Lord Dacre, and was created a baronet in June, 1861.

MR. J. INGLESANT.

Mr. Joseph Inglesant, Barrister-at-Law, of Westfield House, Quorndon, Leicestershire, died suddenly on the 10th of March, at Woburn-place, Russell-square, London. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1862, and was a member of the Norfolk Circuit, practising also at the Leicester borough and county sessions.

MR. H. KNAPTON.

Mr. Henry Knapton, B.A., formerly a special pleader, of Lincoln's-inn, died at Stoke Newington on the 8th of March, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

MR. C. JEWISON.

The coronership for the liberty of the honour of Pontefract, in Yorkshire, has become vacant by the demise of Mr. Christopher Jewison, which took place at Rothwell on the 5th of March. The late Mr. Jewison, who had reached the advanced age of eighty-five years, was coroner of Pontefract for a period of fifty-three years, and is said to have been the oldest coroner in England.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

ON CHARGES BY AD VALOREM FOR MORTGAGES.*

The remuneration of attorneys has long been a subject matter of discussion, not only in our various law societies, but in almost every law organ now extant, and in this society we have had papers read viewing the subject from various standpoints; the question has not escaped the vigilant care of our committee on several occasions, and I notice that it stands first for consideration in the summons for our next monthly meeting.

The inadequacy of payment to an attorney is too notorious to dwell upon, for while people in other occupations are permitted to make their own charges and so keep pace with the expensive times in which we live, the attorney cannot do so, but is tied down to the ancient fee of the mark and the noble, which would go a long way half a century ago when rents, clothing, and provisions were very much less than they are now. An instance of this keeping pace with the times occurred to me in a small way lately in two tradesmen's bills; the one was charged, John Jones, plasterer, working at your house, seven shillings per day, and an assistant, four shillings per day; and the other, Thomas Styles, painter, six shillings and sixpence per day, and no doubt you can all recollect when two-thirds of such figures was thought ample wages.

But it is not my intention to enter into the question of remuneration generally (the subject is too wide for me), but I have chosen a particular section of an attorney's labours on which to make a few remarks in respect of remuneration, or rather on the mode of charging for remuneration. I allude to the practice now gaining ground of charging for mortgages by a commission or per centage on the amount lent. I am induced to write upon this subject from the fact of several transactions of this character having lately come under my immediate notice; and the more I think about it the more improper I consider the practice to be. How can you fix a per centage for your charges without knowing the amount to be lent and the character of the title? The answer to the first of these objections will, of course, be—we charge our commission by a sliding scale; say for instance, under £500, £3 per cent.; under £1,000, 2½ per cent.; under £2,000, 2 per cent.; under £4,000, 1½ per cent., and so on; this per centage is ideal on my part, but may be pretty near the standard of some professional gentlemen. But this does not meet the exigency of the case without knowing the character of the title. The whole philosophy of the thing proceeds on the idea of remuneration according to trouble and risk, and therefore the borrower of £2,000 on premises held under lease from Lord Derby (which we all know to be a printed lease on one skin and perhaps twenty folios long) ought not to incur so much expense as a borrower of £2,000 on a freehold title, the abstract of which is often very long, with deeds to be examined at two or three distant and wide-apart places (not an uncommon thing). In the one case the tariff would pay very well, but in the other case would not pay at all; or in the one case it might be a fearful overcharge, and in the other a case of fair remuneration. Take an illustration in my own office. A gentleman was lately offered two securities for some mortgage money, and he accepted them both. One was for £2,100 on a new lease for seventy-five years, which the borrower handed to me, and the expense of the mortgage deed amounted to under £15, or about 16s. per cent.; and the other was for £1,500 on freehold premises, abstract lengthy and a day's journey to examine the deeds at a distant town, and the expenses of this mortgage deed amounted to about £25, nearly £1 15s. per cent.

Look at the matter in another light, namely, attorneys having different notions of the value of their services, and consequently charging a different amount of commission for the same work. I know a party who borrowed £5,000 in Liverpool, and the charge was £1 per cent. or £50 and the stamps, and I know another party who borrowed £7,000 in Liverpool, and the charge was £2 per cent. or £140 and the stamps. I acted for both borrowers and perused the mortgage deeds, and I consider the trouble in each case was much the same, and that £30 amply paid each attorney, according to present recognised charges, allowing, however, an additional £10 for the £7,000 mortgage to cover the additional procuration fee and stamps. But a climax to this charging by commission will be found in a letter from an attorney in the country (who advertised money to lend), to an applicant in Liverpool. It runs as follows:—

Terms.—When the mortgagor is a man of substance and can procure some one to join him in a bond for the amount of the advance and interest:

To preparing conveyance and mortgage, including stamps, parchment, and fees for searching for judgments, &c.....	£6 per cent.
For mortgage only, ditto, ditto, £5 per cent. then the security is risky and no bond given.
To preparing conveyance and mortgage, &c.	£8 per cent.
For mortgage, &c.....	£7 per cent.

This state of things necessarily places attorneys in unjust and dishonourable competition with each other and lowers the standard of the profession, and reduces the attorney to the level of a shopkeeper, who buys his goods in the lowest market and bargains for the largest discount for cash, and strives to screw out of his customers the largest profit he thinks they will be talked out of. I am not assuming a state of things that may come to pass, in suggesting that a borrower (if charging by commission becomes a rule in the profession) will always find out the attorney who charges the lowest commission, and then try to drive a bargain with some other attorney whom he prefers, but I speak of a state of things that has come under my own knowledge; for instance, a client borrowed, unknown to me, £8,000 on freehold property. I had prepared his conveyance but could not lend him the £8,000, and he therefore applied to an estate agent for the loan, and without difficulty obtained it, and was afterwards introduced to the attorney of the intended mortgage, and very early, and before the attorney knew anything of the character of the title, he informed the borrower the amount intended to be charged for the mortgage deed, namely £100. This figure very much astonished him, and he complained of the large sum the borrowing of the money would come to altogether, as he was to pay the estate agent his commission of one-half per cent., say £40, upon which the attorney said, well then we will call my charges £80. This showed the attorney was quite prepared to be bargained with, and thereby he put himself in a false position and the borrower would think but meanly of him. I have given the climax of charging by commission, and I cannot resist giving the climax of this unprofessional system of bargaining. I had two clients, and one of them (an executor) agreed to lend the other £40,000 on a very good security, the title to which consisted of a conveyance, not more than two skins, from an original owner, whose title in Liverpool is never inquired into. I was not the attorney for the mortgagee in this transaction, as the money came through an executorship which was in the hands of another attorney. The mortgagee approved of the goodness of the security, but referred me to Mr. A. as the attorney to prepare the mortgage deed—who, it will be observed, had nothing to do with the loan nor with the value of the property, but only to see that the mortgagor's title was good, and to prepare the mortgage deed. I waited on Mr. A. with my client, handed to him an abstract of the title, four sheets long, produced to him the title deed (with which he was quite satisfied) and asked him to prepare the mortgage. The money was half in a bank in Liverpool, and the other half was to come from abroad; so it was arranged that the mortgage was to be for £20,000, and for any further advance not exceeding in the whole £40,000. At this first interview the attorney spoke about his charges, and named £200; this amount greatly surprised the borrower, but the attorney insisted on it, on the ground of the great responsibility attached to so large a sum of money, and that he would have made large profits if his client had put the money out in several sums. The mortgagor argued that there was no responsibility, as he (the attorney) admitted the title to be good, and the mortgagee had approved of the value of the property, and had agreed to lend the money, so that Mr. A. had not even had the trouble of finding the money, or passing his judgment on the value of the security. After some further conversation it was finally amicably arranged that the borrower was to pay the attorney £100 for preparing the mortgage deed. In a short time the mortgagee informed the mortgagor that circumstances had occurred which prevented the £20,000 coming from abroad at present, and the result was that only £20,000 was lent, and the borrower executed the mortgage for that sum, and received the amount. Then followed a debit note from the attorney for the £100, upon which the mortgagor sent him a check for £50; this made him very wrathful, and he demanded the other £50 as per agreement, and threatened many things. This led to an interview between them, at which I was present, and the mortgagor well argued that, as the attorney was to have so large a sum as £100 because of the magnitude of the transaction, and the consequent great responsibility, he was fairly paid with £50, as he had only dealt with half the £40,000 (he might have added, and would have the benefit hereafter of putting out the £20,000 to come from abroad), and he (the borrower) would have to incur further expense in raising the other £20,000. The attorney did not see it in this light, and, to make an end of the dispute, suggested that his client (the mortgagee) should be asked to say whether he was not entitled to the full £100. The mortgagor agreed to this proposal, and the question was submitted to the mortgagee accordingly, whose judgment in writing was to the effect that if his attorney had received £50 for his services he was very well paid. This transaction would not elevate our profession in the eyes of either the mortgagor or the mortgagee.

There is only one more light in which I will ask you to consider this question, and that is the very lax way in which an attorney will be tempted to do his work when he is paid by commission. For instance, three certificates of burial are wanted to complete the title, but the attorney tells his conveyancing clerk not to mind them, as they can be obtained at any time, as the abstract shows when the parties died, and where buried. Or the attorney sees by the marginal notes that the abstract has been lately examined, with the deeds, by his friend, Mr. A. B., solicitor, and therefore risks that examination, and saves himself the trouble, and perhaps the expense, of a journey to two distant towns. These suggested omissions will supply my hearers with many similar ones that might be here added; and thus, from the absence of necessary documents, a mortgagee does not get as perfect a title as he ought to have at the hands of his solicitor; and the unfortunate mortgagor is put to the expense of obtaining all these things when the property comes to be sold, either by himself or the mortgagee, because they are not found with the mortgagee's deeds; and the previous circumstances, showing they ought to be there, having been paid for long ago, are all forgotten. Let me give you a case in point, as I have done in support of my previous remarks. I delivered an abstract of title to a Liverpool attorney, who had agreed to lend £4,000 on the property, and I remarked to his conveyancing clerk, who had the management of the business, that he would hardly require to examine the abstract with the deeds at several attorneys' offices in Liverpool and one in London, as he would see by the notes in the margin of the abstract that I myself had personally examined the abstract with all the deeds, and that very lately when I took up the title for the borrower. He replied something like this, "Of course I must see all the deeds, it is our duty to our client, and the amount is large and we are responsible;" but before our interview ended I made a remark that a new rule was adopted in his office as regarded the charges for mortgages (for the attorney had sent me a note to say that £1 per cent. and the stamps would be charged for the mortgage deed, though he knew nothing about the title). He inquired—What new rule? and I said, Of charging a per centage upon the amount lent; and he answered—Are you going to pay a per centage upon this mortgage money for our charges? and I said—Yes, for I have a note from Mr. B. to that effect; upon which he replied, "Oh! I am very glad to hear that, as it will save me a deal of trouble. Your examination of the deeds, Mr. Payne, I have no doubt is perfectly correct." And most likely he did not examine the abstract with the deeds, as I was not called upon, by the attorneys having possession of them, to pay for the production of them; and from what occurred afterwards, I can imagine that he did not even peruse the abstract.

This practice of charging by commission may be greatly abused as the following circumstance shows:—I was asked by an attorney, who knew I did not adopt the commission system, to lend his client a sum of money on mortgage. I agreed to do so. The title was good, the security approved, and the money was lent; and my account was paid by the attorney at the time of completion of the mortgage. But the attorney did not hand my bill of costs to his client, but charged him £2 per cent. as my charges, having previously told him, on transacting the loan, that the usual charge by a mortgagee's solicitor was £2 per cent. on the amount lent.

And now, what is my conclusion of the whole matter? It is this, that attorneys are inadequately remunerated for their labour; and I shall be glad to assist in any reasonable course to obtain a much better payment for their services. But, for the reasons set forth in this paper, I cannot think that a capricious charge by commission for mortgages, and in some offices for conveyances also, can be upheld, nor is it an honourable way for an attorney to obtain his remuneration, though I admit its great convenience to both attorney and client.

LAW STUDENTS DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on Tuesday, the 15th inst., Mr. Widdows in the chair, Mr. L. Hunter, the present secretary, was elected to the office of treasurer, vacant by the resignation of Mr. Herbert; and Mr. A. G. Harvie was appointed auditor, in lieu of Mr. Byrne, resigned. The question for discussion was No. 449 legal—"A., an insurance company, is purchased by and amalgamated with B., another insurance company. After the transfer A. is not wound up.

Can original policyholders of A. enforce the claims under their policies against the shareholders of that company, who have not passed into and become shareholders of B.?" The debate was opened by Mr. Appleton, for Mr. Hargreaves, in the affirmative, and after a discussion, in which 12 members took part, the society decided the question in the affirmative by a majority of 12 to 5. The number of members present was 23.

LEGAL AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

The thirty-third annual general meeting of the shareholders of this society was held on the 8th inst., at the offices, Fleet-street, Sir Thos. Tilson in the chair.

The actuary and manager (Mr. E. A. Newton) read the advertisement convening the meeting.

The report, which was taken as read, stated that the new assurances effected under 152 policies amounted to £298,275, securing a new premium income of £10,791 18s. 9d., of which amount £1,660 2s. 9d. was paid away for the re-assurance of £52,300 with other offices, leaving £9,131 16s. as the net new premium income secured on £245,975, the risk retained by the society. The premium income of the year amounted to £131,158 5s. 7d., and that of 1868 amounted to £127,268 9s. 5d. The sum paid under eighty claims was £101,978. Of this amount £38,078 received bonus additions of £23,333 7s., being at the rate of twenty-seven per cent. In 1868 the claims amounted to £32,715, under eighty-four claims. The total number of claims during the last three years had not exceeded four-fifths of that provided for by the society's tables; while the total amount paid had not exceeded two-thirds of that provided for. The invested funds were at interest at the rate of £4 6s. 8d. per cent., free of income tax—a rate slightly higher than that of the preceding year.

The chairman proposed the adoption of the report and statement of accounts.

The motion, having been seconded, was carried.

Mr. Justice Montague Smith, C. Austin, Q.C., J. Leman, and E. L. Pemberton, Esqrs., were re-elected directors; and Sir W. H. Bodkin and W. Williams, Esq., were re-elected auditors.

LAW STUDENTS' JOURNAL.

INNS OF COURT GENERAL EXAMINATION.

TRINITY TERM, 1870.

The Council of Legal Education have approved of the following rules for the General Examination of the Students.

The attention of the students is requested to the following rules of the Inns of Court:—

"As an inducement, to students to propose themselves for examination, studentships and exhibitions shall be founded of fifty guineas per annum each and twenty-five guineas per annum each respectively, to continue for a period of three years, and one such studentship shall be conferred on the most distinguished student at each general examination, and one such exhibition shall be conferred on the student who obtains the second position; and further, the examiners shall select and certify the names of three other students who shall have passed the next best examinations; and the Inns of Court to which such students as aforesaid belong may, if desired, dispense with any terms, not exceeding two, that may remain to be kept by such students previously to their being called to the bar. Provided that the examiners shall not be obliged to confer or grant any studentship, exhibition, or certificate, unless they shall be of opinion that the examination of the students has been such as entitles them thereto."

"At every call to the bar those students who have passed a general examination, and either obtained a studentship, an exhibition, or a certificate of honour at such examination, shall take rank in seniority over all other students who shall be called on the same day."

"No student shall be eligible to be called to the bar who shall not have attended during one whole year the lectures and private classes of two of the readers, or have been a pupil during one whole year, or periods equal to one whole year, in the chambers of some barrister, certified special pleader, conveyancer, or draftsman in equity, or two or more of such persons, or have satisfactorily passed a general examination. Provided that students admitted before the first day of Hilary Term, 1864, shall have the option of qualifying themselves to be called to the bar, either under the Rules of the Inns of Court of Hilary Term, 1852, or under these regulations."

"That not more than four terms under any circumstances be dispensed with in favour of students coming from India or the colonies, with a view to return to residence there, and that it is not expedient to dispense with any terms for such students except on the following conditions, viz.:—

- "1. That students from India do satisfactorily pass an examination in Hindu and Mahommedan Law, the Indian Penal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Code of Civil Procedure, the Indian Succession Act, and in such other codes and acts as may from time to time become law in British India; and, in addition to such examination, do pass such examinations, and abide by all such rules and regulations as are now in force for students seeking a pass certificate, by examination, for call to the bar.
- "2. That students from the colonies do pass such an examination as is required, and do abide by all such rules and regulations as are now in force, in order to obtain a certificate of honour.
- "3. Provided that each of the four Inns of Court be at liberty to dispense with the above conditions in such very special circumstances as they may think fit, and that such circumstances be stated in the certificate of call to the bar given to every such student. The benchers of each inn, subject to the foregoing limitations, being guided, in the dispensation of terms, by the circumstances of each particular case."

RULES FOR THE EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR HONOURS OR CERTIFICATES, ENTITLING STUDENTS TO BE CALLED TO THE BAR.

An examination will be held in next Trinity Term, to which a student of any of the Inns of Court, who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship, an exhibition, or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the bar, will be admissible.

Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the Treasurer's office of the Inn of Court to which he belongs, on or before Wednesday, the 18th day of May next, and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship, exhibition, or other honourable distinction; or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the bar.

The examination will commence on Wednesday, the 25th day of May next, and will be continued on the Thursday and Friday following, except as regards Hindu Law, &c., to be held on Saturday, May 28.

It will take place in the Hall of Lincoln's-inn, and the doors will be closed ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Wednesday morning, May 25, at ten, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at two, on Equity.

Thursday morning, May 26, at ten, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at two, on the Law of Real Property, &c.

Friday morning, May 27, at ten, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at two, a paper will be given to the students, including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

Saturday morning, May 28, at ten, on Hindu and Mahommedan Law, and on the Laws in force in British India; in the afternoon, at two, a paper upon the foregoing subjects of Hindu Law, &c.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order, during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on the afternoons of Friday and Saturday there will be no oral examination.

The oral examination of each student will be conducted apart from the other students; and the character of that examination will vary according as the student is a candidate for honours, the studentship, the exhibition, or desires simply to obtain a certificate of having satisfactorily passed the general examination.

The oral examination and printed questions will be founded on the books below mentioned, regard being had, however, to the particular object with a view to which the student presents himself for examination.

In determining the question whether a student has passed the examination in such a manner as to entitle him to be called to the bar, the examiners will principally have regard to the general knowledge of law and jurisprudence which he has displayed.

A student may present himself at any number of examinations, until he shall have obtained a certificate.

Any student who shall obtain a certificate may present himself a second time for examination as a candidate for the studentship or exhibition, but only at the general examination immediately succeeding that at which he shall have obtained such certificate: provided that, if any student so presenting himself shall not succeed in obtaining the studentship or exhibition, his name shall not appear in the list.

Students who have kept more than eleven terms shall not be admitted to an examination for the studentship.

The reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Hallam's "History of the Middle Ages," chapter 8.
 2. Hallam's "Constitutional History."
 3. Broom's "Constitutional Law."
 4. The chief statutes from the date of Magna Charta to that of the Union with Scotland.
 5. The principal State trials of the Stuart period.
- Candidates for pass certificates will be examined in 1 and 3 only, or in 2 and 3 only, at their option.

The reader on Equity proposes to examine in the following books:—

1. Haynes's "Outlines of Equity"; Smith's "Manual of Equity Jurisprudence" (last edition); Hunter's "Elementary View of the Proceedings in a suit in Equity" Part I (last edition).

2. On Resulting Trusts (continued).
3. On Relief in Equity against Mistake.

In the elementary private class the subjects discussed will be—Relief in Equity against Breaches of Agreement, and against Waste.

In the advanced private class the lectures will comprehend—the Jurisdiction of Equity in Matters of Account and Partnership.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY, &c.

The reader on the Law of Real Property, &c., proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, twelve public lectures (there being six lectures in each course) on the following subjects:—

Elementary Course.

1. On Conditions of Sale, and the Force and Construction of the Clauses usually introduced therein on the Sale by Auction of Freehold Lands in several Lots.
2. On an Agreement for the Sale of Real Estate, and the consequences thereof.
3. On Equitable Conversion.

Advanced Course.

On Wills.

In the elementary private classes the reader will continue his course of Real Property Law, using as a text-book Mr. Joshua Williams' "Principles of the Law of Real Property;" and in his advanced private classes he will take as his subjects for discussion, Title by Prescription and under the Statutes of Limitation, using as a text-book Mr. Brown's "Treatise on the Law of Limitation as to Real Property."

JURISPRUDENCE, CIVIL AND INTERNATIONAL LAW.

The reader on Jurisprudence, Civil and International Law, proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, six public lectures on the following subjects:—

1. A comparison of the Roman, English, and French System of Law relating to Husband and Wife.
2. The Patria Potestas of the Roman Law, compared with the Power of the Father over the Person and Property of his Child by the English and French Law respectively.
3. The History and Present State of International Law relating to Blockade.

The reader, in his private class, will continue the consideration of the Roman Law relating to Contract, and will commence with "Societas." He will use as text-books Sandars' "Institutes of Justinian," "Code Napoléon," and "Code de Commerce," and "Lindley on Partnership."

The reader, in his private class, will also continue the discussion of points of International Law relating to the "International Rights of States in their Hostile Relations," using the work of Wheaton as the text-book, and referring to the works of the principal modern Jurists, the decisions of the Admiralty and Prize Courts of England and America, the debates in Parliament, and State Papers relating to the cases under discussion.

COMMON LAW.

The reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, two courses (of six public lectures each) on the following subjects:—

Elementary Course.

1. The Office and Duties of Magistrates in relation to Criminal Charges.
2. Indictable Offences of Ordinary Occurrence.
3. The Law of Evidence as applied at Criminal Trials.

Advanced Course.

1. Criminal Procedure preliminary to Trial.
2. The Pleadings in Criminal Cases.
3. Proofs admissible at a Criminal Trial.

With his private classes the reader will consider in detail the above subjects, exemplify them by cases, and explain them by reference to the following books:—

Elementary Class—"Commentaries by Broom and Hadley," Vol. IV.; "Archbold's Criminal Pleading" (16th edition), by Bruce.

Advanced Class—"Taylor on Evidence" (last edition), and the books above mentioned.

LAWS IN FORCE IN BRITISH INDIA.

The reader on Hindu and Mahomedan Law, and the Laws in force in British India, proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, a course of six public lectures on the following subjects, viz.:—

1. Introductory Lecture.
2. Intestacy and Testamentary Act.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

Consols have been rather dull this week, though somewhat less so at its close. The foreign market has been more buoyant. The railway market was firmest at the middle of the week; since then prices have been very irregular. There has been very much speculation lately in telegraph shares, and these investments have consequently declined in price.

SPECIAL FEES TO COUNSEL.—At the chambers of Vice-Chancellor James yesterday, in the winding-up case of the Albert Life Assurance Company, an application was made by Messrs. Lewis, Munns, & Co., as solicitors for the official liquidator, for an allowance of special fees to counsel in certain cases in which it was necessary that the official liquidator should be represented in the Court of Chancery. Fees of 50 guineas in a case had been given to Sir Roundell Palmer, and the Taxing Master had refused to allow them. The Chief Clerk (Mr. Bloxam) said he could not interfere in such a matter. A discretion as to fees to counsel was vested in a Taxing Master, and the present application was that he should take away that discretion. It certainly would not become him to interfere with the discretion which the Taxing Master had exercised in a winding-up case. Mr. Musgrave, who made the application, said the chief clerks in winding-up cases knew the matters in which counsel were engaged much better than the Taxing Masters. The Chief Clerk said the application could be made to the Judge, but he must decline to entertain it for the reason he had mentioned.—Times.

LANCASHIRE CORONERS.—An order of her Majesty in Council has been issued, dividing the Salford and Rochdale coroners' districts into three—to be called the Salford, Bolton, and Rochdale divisions—one to be assigned to each of the persons now holding the office of coroner within those districts. The coronership of the newly-formed Bolton division has been assigned to Mr. Edge, formerly deputy-coroner for the Salford Hundred. With reference to these arrangements the following motion will be brought forward at the annual session of the county magistrates, to be held at Preston on the 31st March:—"That the salaries hitherto paid to the coroners for the Salford and Rochdale districts, from the date of the appointment of the coroner for the new Bolton district until the next quinquennial revision, be apportioned thus: Mr. Price, Salford, £675; Mr. Molesworth, Rochdale, £410; and Mr. Edge, Bolton, £370.

A FEMALE JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.—We learn from the Chicago Legal News that Mrs. Amelia Hobbs has been elected justice of the peace in Jersey Landing township, Jersey county, Illinois. Mrs. Hobbs' opponent candidate, the Chicago Legal News adds, is too gallant to carry the contest to the length of objecting to the election on the ground of sex. At the date of this piece of news the result of the election had not yet been certified to the governor; we are therefore not in a position to say whether it will be confirmed.

Lord Fitzwalter has resigned the chairmanship of the East Kent Quarter Sessions.

LONDON, MARCH 26, 1870.

IT IS NO DOUBT INEVITABLE that as long as a bill of any great political importance is in its progress through Parliament, it should be discussed almost exclusively by politicians and with reference to its general principles. But the moment the bill has become an Act it passes into the hands of lawyers, who, in giving effect to its provisions, have to regard them in a very different light from the politicians. It is therefore often an unfortunate thing that bills of the class to which we refer are so seldom subjected to any really searching examination by the lawyers in Parliament to secure that their provisions can be practically worked. There has seldom been a bill in the case of which such an examination was more important than in that of the Irish Land Bill; but so far there is little reason to suppose that it will receive anything of the kind. Inasmuch, however, as every clause of the Act will have to be interpreted and acted upon by Courts of justice, and as we know by every day's experience that no one but a lawyer can form anything like a reliable forecast of the difficulties of interpretation surrounding a section, we hope that the details of the bill may yet receive fair attention while in committee. We can only illustrate our meaning by referring to two sections, but they are the first two, and perhaps the most important two in the bill.

Our readers will recollect that the bill treats of three classes of occupiers of land, and provides a separate scheme of compensation for each; these are, occupiers under the Ulster tenant-right usage, occupiers out of Ulster under similar usages, and occupiers not falling within either of these classes. The first two of these kinds of occupiers are dealt with in the first two sections of the bill. The first section says that "The usage prevalent in the province of Ulster with reference to the compensation to be made or allowed to or on account of an outgoing tenant of a holding [such usage is commonly known and in this Act referred to as the Ulster tenant-right custom] is hereby declared to be a legal custom, and shall in the case of any holding in the province of Ulster, proved to be subject to such usage, be enforced in manner provided by this Act, &c." The second section says that "Where in any place not situate within the province of Ulster a tenant is disturbed in his holding by the act of the landlord and such holding is proved to be subject to a usage by virtue of which compensation is made or allowed to or on account of an outgoing tenant of a holding, the tenant so disturbed shall be entitled to such compensation as the Court may find to be payable to him according to the usage to which the holding is proved to be subject."

The first broad question which seems to us to arise upon these sections is one common to both of them. What is the meaning of a holding being subject to a usage? Will it be necessary to prove in each case a custom in compliance with all the requirements of the common law—certain, reasonable, and general? This view we may probably dismiss at once. The Legislature can hardly be understood as merely saying that a legal custom shall be a legal custom. Secondly, is the effect of the Act to remove all objections in point of law to what may be proved in fact to exist as a usage or custom, in the sense which those words bear both in legal and popular language, that is to say a course of dealing generally prevalent in certain districts or among certain classes as distinguished from the habits of dealing of particular individuals? If this view were adopted it would follow that a usage confined to the estate of a particular landlord, or to a particular farm is not within the Act. Thirdly, will it be enough to show a practice on a particular estate or with respect to a particular farm is so well known and well established, that a tenant may be fairly said to have taken his holding on the strength of it, that it may fairly be regarded in common sense, though not in law, a part of his own contract? If this view be taken the bill, in reality, simply alters in some respects the rules of evidence as to the mode in which contracts may be proved. Fourthly, to prove a holding to be subject to a usage, and within these sections, will it be enough to show that a certain practice has been pursued towards the occupants of given holdings, though no one has ever thought of regarding it as in any sense a right, or anything beyond a mere act of benevolence? For instance, if it be proved that for some time past Mr. A., whenever he has had to evict tenants, has always helped to pay their passage-money to America, if they liked to go, just as Mrs. A. has always given them port wine when they were ill and needed it—will this become a legal duty for the future?

In addition to the difficulty of construction which we have pointed out as common to the two sections, there is another peculiar to the first. That section legalises "the usage prevalent in the province of Ulster." These words certainly seem to point to some one usage generally prevalent throughout all Ulster, not to an indefinite number of different usages existing in different parts of that province. Will a tenant then who claims under this section be forced to give some evidence that the usage on which he relies is general throughout Ulster? And will his claim be met by showing that that usage is confined to a mere corner of one county, and that in each of the adjoining counties the usage is totally different? Or, on the other hand, will "the usage prevalent in Ulster" be construed as meaning all usages prevalent in Ulster or any part of it?

The questions we have put are no idle ones; they must be solved as soon as the bill comes into working. And according to the answers given to them the bill may prove the merest dead letter, or have a very real operation. Is it too much to ask that legislators should consider with themselves what it is that they really mean to do? Of all the amendments as yet proposed in the first and second sections of the bill, none seem to us to have any tendency to remove the difficulties we have pointed out, except, in the case of Ulster, those which purport to set out the tenant right custom which is to be law for the future.

IN ANOTHER COLUMN will be found a note of a recent application to the Master of the Rolls, to invalidate a purchase made by a solicitor at a sale by auction in a foreclosure suit. The peculiarity of the case was that the solicitor in question was concerned, not in the suit in which the sale was made, but in an administration suit instituted by creditors of the mortgagee (who had died after the institution of the principal suit). The plaintiffs in the administration suit had obtained leave to attend the proceedings in the principal suit, but, as we understand the case, the order was made after the sale in question. The solicitor's name had been placed on the particulars. He had already, when the application to discharge him was made, been confirmed as a purchaser by the chief clerk's certificate. The Master of the Rolls considered that the Sales by Auction Act, 1867, did not apply to the case, and that the transaction was within that class of cases in which the Court forbids a purchase by a person whom it considers as saddled with the duty of endeavouring that the price shall be the highest obtainable. We understand that it is intended to appeal from this decision.

There is a multitude of cases in which it has been laid down that trustees and their agents, and other persons whose duty it is to procure a large price, shall not be allowed to purchase themselves; and in Ex parte Lacey (6 Ves. 626) Lord Eldon expressly declared that this rule is independent of any actual advantage taken by the purchaser, but depends on purely a priori considerations. To the same effect is Hamilton v. Wright (9 Cl. & F. 123). In the recent case of Tennant v. Trenchard (L. R. 4 Ch. 547), Lord Hatherley, in the case of a trustee, laid down the rule very strictly as to fiduciary purchases. In that case the application was on the part of a trustee, that he might be permitted to bid. Lord Hatherley said "the cases where liberty to bid has been refused are mostly cases of solicitors, the reason of the rule being, that a solicitor must have acquired much information, and that the Court could feel no security that he would do his duty and communicate this information so as to raise the price, if he had a prospect of becoming the purchaser." The general principle upon which the Court proceeds is a perfectly intelligible and a just one, but we do not think that much stress is to be laid upon the speculations as to the effect of an interested bidder upon other persons attending the sale; according to the circumstances or the temperament of the outsider, he might be stimulated to increase his own biddings or to withdraw from the competition. Indeed, each of these hypotheses has in its turn been adopted by the Court, though the latter the more frequently. In Tennant v. Trenchard, Lord Hatherley observed, "It has been said that his (trustee's) bidding will be an advantage to the sale, as the more bidders there are the better chance there will be of a good sale; but, on the other hand, the knowledge that the trustee was a bidder might keep others away, as they might consider that he would bid to the utmost value of the property, and then, if any one else bid more, would leave it." While in Sanderson v. Walker (13 Ves. 602), Lord Eldon regarded a bid by a trustee, "who ought to know the value," as calculated to raise the estate under the hammer in the eyes of bystanders.

There is, we think, no ground for considering that the 7th section of the Sales by Auction Act, 1867, applied to the case above referred to.

THE PROVISIONS OF THE Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill, which is now being passed through Committee in the House of Commons, are undoubtedly exceedingly severe; but are they unnecessarily so? Although the bill has been received with a general approval, a few voices have denounced it as unconstitutional. Unconstitutional, however it cannot be, since it is submitted to the constitutional Legislature in the accustomed manner. Unusual in character it certainly is, but it is aimed at what is, happily for us, an unusual state of circumstances, and of which the Government may, we think, fairly claim to be the best judges.

THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

Although, as the Lord Chancellor said in moving the second reading of the High Court of Justice Bill, it is impossible really to consider these bills separately, it is nevertheless convenient, for some purposes, to look at them separately in detail, and with this view we propose to consider first the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill, more particularly because we desire that it should assume such a shape as to admit of, and secure, its passing at once, whatever may be the fate of the companion measure. There were intimations, and those not obscure, let fall by noble lords in the debate on the second reading, which point towards a select committee, or, which would equally dispose of the bills for the present session, a motion to remit them to the Judicature Commission for completion. That one or the other of these courses may be taken about the High Court of Justice Bill is not improbable; the matter in hand is so complicated and so important, the bill itself so slight and sketchy, that it would seem certainly to invite, and almost to necessitate, some such step; but the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill stands on a very different basis, and we sincerely trust that it will not be considered so intimately bound up with the other as of necessity to share its fortunes.

The entire reorganisation of our judicial system, though much wanted, is a matter of very great difficulty and importance, and the loss of a year or two for the purpose of well considering and perfecting a scheme of such magnitude is not worth taking into account; and although we concur, and have more than once expressed our concurrence, with the scheme proposed by the Judicature Commission, and intended to be given effect to by the bills now before Parliament, still the question of details is one of the very highest consequence; and, however much we may deprecate delay, we cannot reasonably object to the very fullest examination of any proposed legislation. But in the case of the Courts of Appeal the state of the matter is very different; the existing evils are greater and more generally acknowledged, the remedy is simpler and more readily acquiesced in, the necessary machinery is more inexpensive and more ready to hand. There can be no reason whatever, except the connection between the two bills, why this bill should not be disposed of at once in Committee of the whole House, and sent down to the House of Commons in a shape to secure its acceptance quite irrespective of any other legislative action, intended or anticipated. For this purpose, however, it will be necessary to modify the bill in two respects—1st, to get rid of the clause which makes the "commencement of the Act" dependent on the commencement of the other Act; and secondly, to vary in some measure the provisions as to the "selected judges." We will proceed to show, as shortly as we may, why and how this ought to be done.

And first, as to the Why. The evils of the existing courts of appeal, particularly at common law, have long been widely felt, and generally admitted, and for many years—even before the question was raised, never again to rest, by the well-known speech of Sir Roundell Palmer on the subject in the House of Commons—the greatest dissatisfaction has prevailed; and the demand for a single strong Court of Appeal, which should serve to keep the law uniform, and whose decisions should meet with general submission, has been steadily increasing. The present condition of our appellate jurisdiction is, indeed, piteous; from the Court of Admiralty there is no readily accessible court of appeal at all, for the delay and expense involved in a resort to the Privy Council practically prevent an appeal in a multitude of cases. The Court of Probate is in a similar position; while the appellate tribunal which is supposed to control the proceedings of the Court of Divorce is worse than a mockery, because in a large class of cases it has no jurisdiction at all, and the appellant must go at once to the House of Lords; and in the vast majority of the remaining cases its decision is final—a grievance of a different but not less serious kind. The constitution of this Court, too, seems to us peculiarly objectionable, consisting as it does of the judge appealed from as President, assisted by two judges taken pro hac vice from a totally different class of work, and, therefore, inevitably inclined to depend on his judgment rather than their own. As a court of first instance for the trial of important questions, which was originally its primary function, the Court is an admirable one, but we cannot regard it as possessing any one of the essential features of a good court of appeal. When we come to the courts of common law the matter, if not really worse, at least assumes a more ludicrous aspect, for we find a system by which the same judges are vicissim appealed from and appealed to, so that Mr. Justice X. may in the case of C. v. D. retaliate upon Mr. Baron Y., who has reversed his judgment in the case of A. v. B. And it has certainly happened once (in Rickett's case, 15 W. R. 937), and may have happened frequently, that the decision arrived at on an important question depended solely on which of two appeals was first heard. In equity there is, at present, no Court of Appeal capable of sitting more than two days in the week, except for the purpose of interlocutory applications and appeals from the exercise of the summary jurisdiction of the Court, and this Court, thus limited, has to keep down an ever-increasing list of appeals from four judges in constant work, a large majority of whose decisions would, if there were a satisfactory and speedy Court of Appeal, be brought under review.* The Court of Bankruptcy alone remains, and there we have practically the most unsatisfactory of all possible systems of appeal—viz., an appeal on mixed questions of law and fact from a single judge to a single judge.

Under these circumstances it seems to us that whatever may be done with respect to the courts of first instance no time ought to be lost in creating a thoroughly effective court of appeal, that is to say, a court which would be readily accessible at a cost small in comparison with the general costs of suit, and whose decisions will carry with them such weight as to render infrequent the resort to the ultimate court of appeal. We may add that were such a court established it would in our opinion be well to transfer to it the jurisdiction on appeal from the county courts, now divided in a most unsatisfactory manner amongst the superior courts of first instance. We do not, of course, propose to allow a further appeal from these decisions, but the costs of an appeal direct to the High Court of Appeal would not exceed those at present incurred in going to a court of common law, or the judge of the Admiralty Court, or Vice-Chancellor Stuart; while the objection to conferring on any judge of first instance, whose original decisions are necessarily subject to, and inevitably the subject of, frequent appeals, the right of pronouncing final decisions, is too obvious to require to be insisted on.

Next, as to the How. The bill before us seems well calculated to afford just such a court as we desire, with merely a few alterations required to separate it from the High Court of Justice Bill, and enable it to stand alone. Clause 2 should be altered by making the Act commence (at latest) on the 1st of November, 1870, irrespective of any other Act whatever. Clauses 3 and 5 might well stand as they are, with a temporary clause that, until the High Court of Justice should be constituted, her Majesty should annually select three judges from the Vice-Chancellors and puisne judges at common law to act as the "selected judges" of the Court of Appeal, and that, in the interpretation of the Act, the phrase High Court of Justice should, until the constitution of such court, be read to mean the High Court of Chancery, the Superior Courts of Common Law, the Courts of Probate, Divorce, and Bankruptcy, and the High Court of Admiralty, or any of such courts.†

There appears to be an error of some kind in clause 8; which provides that for purposes of general precedence the ordinary judges of appeal shall "take rank after the Lord President of the High Court of Justice." The Lord President of the High Court of Justice is, by clause 3 of that bill, the Lord Chancellor, and we therefore suppose that this is a typographical error merely, and that what is really meant is after "the junior of the Lords Presidents of Divisional Courts of Justice," i.e., in the same place now accorded to Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery. If so, this, as we have before pointed out, perpetuates the anomaly which Lords Cranworth and Hatherley have thought so objectionable in the case of the Master of the Rolls, because here are judges whose sole duty it will be to review the decisions of the High Court of Justice (including those of Lord Chief Justice Bovill, the Lord Chief Baron, and Lord Penzance), and who are yet deliberately placed below those judges in the scale of general precedence. We do not say that this question is of any great importance, but as it has been so treated by two different Lords Chancellors, we are not entitled to regard it as of no moment.

We cannot accede to the proposal in clause 9 that the permanent Judges of Appeal should only receive the salary of a vice-chancellor or puisne judge. The Lord Chancellor defended this provision on the ground that by getting off going circuit they would be saved some £700 a-year in expenses, but that does not seem to us to meet the case, more especially when we find that it is proposed—and properly, as we think—to pay to the Lords Presidents, though judges of inferior jurisdiction, the salary of £6,000 per annum. Whatever may be said in favour of treating the "selected judges" as sufficiently recompensed by the mere fact of their selection, we think that the salary of the permanent judges of appeal ought not to be less than £6,000.

We regret much not to see any provision for preventing the appointment of the same selected judges year after year, which would, we think, deprive the Court of much of the benefit which the provision for selection was designed to secure; and we fear that if the selected judges are immediately re-eligible it will at no distant period come to be thought discourteous not to re-appoint them—just as we now see in the case of revising barristers and other officials for short terms of years—and perpetual re-appointment will become the rule, and not the exception. This tendency to permanence is inherent in all institutions, and just as old feudal appointments of dignity, when made for life, had a tendency to become hereditary, so we every day see that appointments of every kind, though nominally annual, triennial, or at pleasure, if unconnected with local or party politics, have a tendency, where the official is immediately re-eligible, to become practically offices during good behaviour. But this would prevent that free circulation of judicial thought which is so desirable in a court of the kind proposed, and tend to produce that very stagnation the removal of which was one object of the Judicature Commissioners.

Much objection was taken in the House of Lords to the extensive power of making rules given to the Court, but we do not see that, so far as this court is concerned, any more convenient plan could have been adopted. When we come to the complicated and expensive procedure of a court of first instance it may be well that certain statutory directions should be given even on questions of practice merely, though over-legislation on such a subject is likely to prove very prejudicial; but in the regulation of such questions as can arise with reference to the procedure upon appeals, we think the Court which has to hear such appeals by far the best authority to refer to, and are very unwilling to fetter its discretion by any statutory rules upon the point. In one particular, however, we think that the Legislature might well intervene: the quorum of the High Court of Justice—one sitting as "the Court itself," and not as a division—is seven judges, and it might well be enacted that any appeal from that Court should be heard by the Court of Appeal itself, that is, by not less than five judges.

Grave objection has been taken to that part of the bill which deals with the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords and Privy Council; and it has been urged, not without show of reason, that this jurisdiction ought to be abolished, and absorbed in that of the High Court of Appeal. But in the first place we do not agree in the desirability of having the immediate Court of Appeal also the ultimate one. The immediate appeal

* This is shown by the fact that during all the time that the Court of Appeal was sitting daily—and two Courts sitting together for two days in every week—it never was for more than a day or two at a time, and those at long intervals, without a constant supply of work, and that, notwithstanding the obvious objections to an appeal to a single judge or two judges only.

† The proposal in clause 7 that the judges shall be styled "judges of the High Court of Appeal" seems unnecessarily to lower the status of the Court; we should prefer their bearing the titles of "Lords Justices of Appeal," already known and appropriated to judges holding exactly their position.

ought to be cheap, speedy, and easy of attainment, because a large proportion of litigants are desirous of, and entitled to, a second opinion on their case; the ultimate appeal ought not to be resorted to except upon very weighty occasions, and cheapness and rapidity are there of comparatively no moment. We do not say that the existing ultimate courts of appeal are the best that can be had, still less that it is desirable to have two such courts, but we do say that whatever may be the constitution or procedure of such ultimate court or courts, it ought materially to differ from that of the Court we are now considering. Another objection to the abolition of the present ultimate courts of appeal lies in the nature of their jurisdiction. The High Court of Appeal is a court for England only, composed exclusively of English judges, and dealing solely with English law; it would thus be a most unfit court to which to refer appeals from Ireland, Scotland, and the Colonies, which now go naturally to the House of Lords and Privy Council—to the one as representing the whole United Kingdom, to the other as the embodiment of her Majesty's Imperial jurisdiction; and it is certain that none of those countries would readily acquiesce in any transfer of jurisdiction as regards them to a purely English court, while to retain the old jurisdiction as regards the rest of the empire, and abolish it as to England, would be to increase the very evil for the removal of which this abolition is demanded. It may be said that the existing courts are practically purely English courts, but that is not so. Since the Union with Ireland the House of Lords has never been without an Irish Lord Chancellor (though Lord St. Leonards, who now represents Ireland, does not sit as such), and though Scotland has not been equally well treated she has at any rate now no right to complain, seeing that she is efficiently represented in the person of Lord Colonsay. The case of the colonies is not so strong, and but few colonial judges have found their way to the Judicial Committee, but the jurisdiction has been generally and willingly acquiesced in, while we have at any rate no reason to anticipate a similar concurrence in any proposed change. We sincerely hope that the passing of this most valuable bill will not be delayed upon grounds at once so questionable and so unpractical.

THE TRIAL OF PRINCE PIERRE BONAPARTE.

The trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte, before the High Court at Tours, has taken up the greater part of this week, and has offered a very characteristic example of the French criminal procedure and some of its defects. The procedure established for the ordinary criminal courts or courts of assizes (Cours d'Assises) has been extended to the High Court by Article 17 of the Senatus Consultum of the 10th of July, 1852; and, in consequence, the forms gone through for the trial of Prince Pierre Bonaparte, are (save the differences dependent upon the greater number of members of the Court and jurymen) such as might be witnessed in the case of any prisoner taking his trial for a felony.

After the preliminary proceeding of selecting the jury from the panel by lot, and an address from the presiding judge—quite a voluntary effort on his part—the business began by his putting to the prisoner the usual questions as to names and residence, and by the greffier, or clerk of the Court, reading the “act of accusation” (acte d'accusation).

At this first stage of the trial one cannot help making a remark which applies to every part of the system of French criminal procedure—that it gives an enormous power to the judicial functionaries who conduct it; they can, in a great measure, direct it as they please, and the fate of the accused is in many cases in their hands. Such is the fact in those preliminary investigations which are to evolve the case that is to be submitted to trial, and which, as may be seen in the course of these very proceedings, may have a very serious influence upon the evidence in the trial itself. During those investigations the prisoner appears alone before the juge d'instruction, or examining magistrate, in the solitude and secrecy of the Cabinet d'Instruction, with no other protecting presence but that of the greffier, or clerk, a subaltern whose function is to take down the statements made by the prisoner or witnesses, which he does from the dictation of the judge. And in practice that dictation embodies, not the diffuse verbatim statements of the party deposing, but what the juge d'instruction conceives to be substantially the import thereof. The witnesses also appear alone before the judge, and their depositions are collected in the same manner. It is, therefore, evident that if there be any bias harboured, even unconsciously, by the judge, that bias must almost inevitably colour the statement thus, as it were, filtered through him; he may disregard as useless verbiage material points, the utility of which may not appear to him. That bias, from the whole tendency of the French system, is generally against the prisoner, but particular circumstances may cause another inclination in the mind of the judge, and induce him to take a favourable view of the case. Rank and position naturally act very strongly on a certain and a numerous class of men. Whether they did so in the course of the “investigations” of Pierre Bonaparte we have not had sufficient opportunity of judging.

But to return from the chamber of the juge d'instruction; where the materials of the trial are prepared, to the court in which it takes place. The reading of the acte d'accusation is (saving the taking the names of the prisoner) the first step in the trial. This acte d'accusation is a fluent narration of the case as the Public Prosecutor conceives it, frequently written with an eye to dramatic effect and with considerable literary pretensions. The view of the Public Prosecutor may be erroneous, the adverse party may be provided with abundant means of confuting it, but the minds of the jury are tintured at the very outset of the case by the statement emanating ex officio from the offices of the Crown Prosecutor. Of course it is directed against the prisoner, and, in general, presents a lively synopsis of the unfortunate passages of his past life, frequently with very little relevancy to the case. There are, however, exceptions to this which it is pleasant to note. In the acte d'accusation against the Prince, for example, there is not the slightest allusion to other acts of violence of a character analogous to that of which he is accused, of which he is currently reported to have been guilty. It is noteworthy, too, that in this paper, expressly drawn up against the Prince, the statements of the witnesses whose evidence tends to justify him are set forth with more copiousness than discrimination, in strong relief against the summary mention made of the “declaration confirmatory” of the accuser, Ulrich de Fonvielle.

Such are the preliminaries of the trial, the first view of the case presented to the jury.

We may now turn to the proceedings of the President. Of all the anomalies of the French criminal procedure, the duties imposed on the President are the strangest. The chief duty of the President is to be impartial, and his functions are so ordered as to render entire impartiality almost impossible. The examination of the prisoner and witnesses is entirely conducted by him. It is his business to extract the truth, or what he believes to be such, from the unwilling, the reticent, and the deceiver; he is to drive the prisoner from the various falsehoods behind which he may seek to screen himself. What his bias must generally be, with habits of mind generally framed by a long previous practice as a juge d'instruction, it is easy to imagine. Nor is it difficult to conceive how he is likely to wield his tremendous power should his temper be naturally excitable, and the resistance of the prisoner energetic and resolute. He puts questions, both to the prisoner and the witnesses, and puts them as he pleases. The questions of counsel are to pass through his lips. He may, if he can, remould them as he thinks fit, and cross-examine and re-examine, suggest and lead, until he has coaxed or driven the deponent into stating what, in his opinion, should have come from him. No cross-examination on the part of counsel. It is easy to conceive what the consequence of such a state of things must be in doubtful cases; and how great, notwithstanding the most honourable and conscientious intention on the part of the President, the peril of the prisoner must necessarily be. This machinery is powerful if brought to bear against the prisoner; but no less powerful if used in his favour. In the present case it is impossible not to observe a very marked peculiarity in the attitude of the President towards the accused. Here we find the President interrogating the prisoner after the reading of the acte d'accusation. After a very mild allusion to a blow given by him to one of his fellow-members in the Constituent Assembly of 1848, and a very proper but unusual pretermission of other circumstances of the same nature in his past career, he proceeds to examine him as to the particulars of the fracas which closed with the death of Victor Noir. The fact of his going to meet visitors in his own house with a cocked revolver in his pocket and his hand thereon is passed over with indulgence, but M. de Fonvielle is severely blamed for carrying a weapon. It rather looks as though the brow-beating which is usually lavished on the prisoner were now bestowed on the principal witnesses for the prosecution. Most of the witnesses were cool and self-possessed; but one witness, Doctor Pinel, got nervous, and his deposition suffered in consequence. The witnesses for the defence seem to receive a very different treatment. They are encouraged by the President, their depositions are propped up, he argues on their side against the counsel for the prosecution, he refreshes their memory where it fails by reading to them the report of their depositions (as leisurely given to the examining magistrate in the privacy of his office, without the presence of adverse counsel, with no other control or cross-examination than he might himself think fit to use), and no cross-examination is allowed to correct the fatal effect of such proceedings. At least this is the complexion which the proceedings present to the eye of an English lawyer. There are persons who continually say "they manage these things better in France;" at any rate the phrase is hardly applicable to criminal procedure.

UNLIMITED LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE OF SERVANTS.

We have received a pamphlet entitled "The Evils of Unlimited Liability for Accidents of Masters and Railway Companies, especially since Lord Campbell's Act," published by Messrs. Butterworth. It is a reprint of a paper read by Mr. Joseph Brown, Q.C., before the Social Science Association. The subject is one which certainly deserves serious attention, and it is not unlikely that, so far, at all events, as railway companies are concerned, there may very shortly be legislation or attempted legislation. We are not able to agree entirely with everything which Mr. Brown advances; at the same time we must say that he puts the arguments against the present state of the law far more forcibly than we have ever seen them put before. Hitherto the arguments we have seen put forward in favour of limiting the liability of railway companies have been such as could scarcely commend themselves to anyone but shareholders, whose interest in the matter might have warped their judgments. Mr. Brown, however, who himself appears to be quite independent in the matter, makes a case likely enough to convince the judgment of independent persons; and if his pamphlet is extensively read by our legislators it may greatly increase the probability of an alteration in the law.

Mr. Brown very nearly avoids altogether the error which has been so common of treating the case of railway companies as one exceptional in theory. He puts forward first the case of ordinary masters, and points out what he considers to be the injustice of our law as regards them, and then shows that the same injustice falls with somewhat exceptional severity on railway companies, partly from the extent and nature of their business, but also to a great extent from the constitution of our tribunals, and the natural inclinations of jurymen. He does, certainly, in some of his remarks upon the nature of their business, which we notice below, advance propositions which seem to go the length of making a special exception in favour of railways. His main argument, however, is based upon the proposition that in the whole of this class of actions, whether against individuals or companies, the penalty for the act of negligence almost always falls on one who is perfectly free from blame, and this he argues is neither just nor politic.

There can be no doubt that in many or even in most of these cases, a very heavy penalty does fall upon a person totally free from blame, but we think it is a mistake to say, as Mr. Brown does, that the servant who is really to blame usually escapes scot free. No doubt it is seldom or ever of any use either for his master or for the person injured to sue him; still, we imagine he practically suffers in other ways. Probably in few cases will masters who have suffered severely by their servants' negligence retain them in their employ. Certainly they usually obtain immunity for some months until the action against their master is tried, for of course until then it would be very dangerous for the master to dismiss them, and possibly Mr. Brown may have founded his assertion that the careless servants usually escape scot free upon the numerous cases in which he may have heard of their being retained in their employment for some time after the occurrence. In the end, however, they usually suffer, not only by the loss of immediate employment but by the difficulty of obtaining other. The pecuniary penalty on the servant cannot of course be as great as on his master, but it may often be as large or larger in proportion to his means, and at all events in those possible, but still somewhat exceptional cases put forward by Mr. Brown, in which masters are absolutely ruined by the consequences of their servants' negligence, the servants will probably be ruined also. Indeed, the ruin of the servant must in practice be much more frequent than the ruin of the master, although the compensation to the injured person comes from the master and not from the servant. Although, however, it is not in our opinion correct to say that the penalty for such accidents falls wholly on the master, while the servant escapes, yet this does not completely answer Mr. Brown's argument. He fails we think to show that any other system would be more efficacious than the present in securing care on the part of servants. His suggestion to give a power of compulsorily deducting a few shillings a week from the servant's wages is, we think, impracticable. It seems to depend upon the continuance of the service, or certainly upon the continued earning of wages in some way. It would be impossible to oblige the master to keep the careless servant at the further risk of his own property, in order to make the deductions, and not much less difficult to oblige the servant to continue in the master's service subject to the deduction, and whatever the master's conduct to him in other respects might be. We scarcely understand whether Mr. Brown contemplates that the compulsory deduction shall be made by a new master after a change of service, but whatever the details of the scheme might be, we fail to see that any such scheme would do more to check carelessness than the present. It is not, however, necessary to the argument, to show that more might be done than at present to check carelessness; if it can be established that as much might be done without imposing a penalty on the master as at present, that will be sufficient in order to answer the argument on the other side, which is founded on the supposed necessity of making the master pay all the compensation in order to make him select careful servants, and to make the servants selected continue to be careful. In fact, however, we apprehend that the more important question is—granting that in all such cases the master should be bound to show that he had done all he could in the first place to select a servant likely to be careful; and secondly, to secure the servant continuing to act carefully in accordance with his previous character—whether, when he could show this he ought, as he does now, to bear all the consequences of his servant's negligence, or whether the actual sufferer ought not at all events to share them with him by recovering from him only a part of the compensation.

Mr. Brown's remarks on this are forcible; he says, "To inflict the full damages caused by an accident on the master is really to forget the peculiar character of accidents, which is that the damage or mischief arising from them bears no proportion whatever to the degree of negligence which brought them about."

"All such cases are compounded of a misfortune and a fault. The fault is the negligence, the damages are often a mere misfortune, and purely accidental in the strictest sense, bearing no kind of proportion to the cause of them. The fault is often perfectly trivial, while the misfortune and the damages are terrible. In a case where the fault was wilful, we admit the justice of throwing the whole consequences on the offender, however much they may exceed the offence. In the case where it was not wilful but merely careless, since the loss must fall either on the careless person or on the injured person, who was blameless, we reconcile ourselves to the rule that the former should bear it, though the penalty exceeds the fault by a hundredfold. But in the case where the sufferer and the master are alike blameless it is revolting to every sense of justice that the whole weight of the damages should be thrown on the latter when the affair was a pure misfortune so far as the master is concerned, and when the enormity of the damage done is purely accidental."

There is, doubtless, sound reasoning in this. The only point which we think Mr. Brown omits to take into consideration is that it is in all these cases the master who has put into his servant's power the means of doing the mischief. Take the ordinary case of driving. The servant driving is probably a person of no property, who cannot be made to compensate the sufferers from his negligent driving. At the same time, he never could do the mischief if he had not had his master's horses and carriage entrusted to him. There is much to be said in favour of making the master liable, at all events, to the extent of the property entrusted to the servant and which causes the mischief. It is upon this principle that the limitation in the Merchant Shipping Acts of the liability of the owner of a ship for damage done by its navigation to £15 a ton upon the ship's tonnage, proceeds.

Passing on now to the question of railway accidents, Mr. Brown points out that the position of companies being really the same as ordinary masters, they suffer to a greater extent from sympathising juries and fraudulent claimants. He points out also that they experience to a greater degree than ordinary masters the same hardship, viz., that by no amount of care on their part can they prevent occasional carelessness on the part of their servants, and that the damages arising from the accidents are commonly out of all proportion to the error committed. As Mr. Brown somewhat quaintly observes, no care on the part of managers can secure servants who will be not men but "guardian angels without wings at two guineas a-week, as the public would have them." At the same time we must own that, in our opinion, serious railway accidents are more frequently caused by insufficient supervision and by habitual neglect of regulations made only to be broken, than by the casual slips of individual servants, though, of course, the latter are occasionally most disastrous.

Having, however, made a fair case for the railway companies as for ordinary masters, in favour of an alteration of the law to the extent of dividing between them and the actual sufferers the damages consequent upon an accident caused by carelessness of subordinate servants, which could not have been prevented by care on the part of the managers or masters, Mr. Brown goes on to urge considerations which we deem fallacious. He urges that the damages caused by railway accidents are out of proportion not only to the error committed, but to the fare paid; that though the trade of railways is more than other trades, dependent for being safely carried on upon qualities in the servants which must occasionally fail, yet that the profits are smaller than in other trades, while the gain to the public from the trade being carried on is greater. He says, "With the full consent of the public, and by the express authority of Parliament, the companies carry on a business in which danger and accident are unavoidable, by which they gain very little, and the public gain very great, in fact incalculable benefits—health, recreation, commerce, wealth, and a thousand other advantages. The public are, therefore, in the strongest sense, partners in the risks of railway traffic, and they are partners who take nearly all the profits and seek to avoid bearing any share of the losses incident to the traffic, all of which are endeavoured to be thrown on the companies."

Now this, if true in all respects, goes only to prove that the fares of railway companies ought to be higher. If the public are to be considered as partners so that they ought to bear some of the losses the losses should be borne not by the individuals who suffer them, but by the travelling public who benefit by the railway, that is to say by the persons who pay fares. Baron Bramwell, in his judgment in Brand v. Hammersmith Railway in the Exchequer Chamber, answered conclusively, in our opinion, a similar argument when advanced as a reason why companies should not pay compensation for injury to property by vibration. He showed that the fares ought to be sufficient to provide a fund for the compensation, and that it was no answer to the claim of individuals to say that the public generally were benefited.

We apprehend, however, that there is some doubt about Mr. Brown's facts. He arrives at the conclusion that the fares are low by comparing the ordinary dividends paid to shareholders with the profits of ordinary trades. But is this fair? Ordinary trade-profits include the price of the tradesman's labour. The dividends of shareholders do nothing of the kind. Even in the case of a railway, if one exists, which has throughout the whole of its existence been prudently managed, it would be unreasonable to expect that shareholders taking no part in the management, could, by merely providing the capital of the company, earn profits on the scale of tradesmen or merchants giving their time and labour as well as capital to their business. And if the whole remuneration paid to directors, managers, and others whose position in the company is so high that they may be considered to occupy the position of managing partners in an ordinary firm, were added to the total of the dividends paid to shareholders, even then the whole profits so calculated could not be expected to equal the profits of an ordinary trade by reason of the disadvantage to which a company, even with the best of management, must inevitably be subject as compared with individuals. Of course railway companies are in a different position from other trades in having a maximum fixed for their fares. This restriction, however, is the price they pay for the monopoly granted them, and for the compulsory power conferred on them. It may be that in some cases it is too high a price. Undoubtedly the fares permitted by Parliament ought to be high enough to permit a fair return upon the shareholders' capital, when managed with reasonable prudence and after making a reasonable allowance for the payment of compensation for accidents caused by negligence of the servants, to an amount not exceeding what may reasonably be expected to occur with proper supervision. If any company, now, is not entitled to charge such fares, it has a good case for having its maximum of fares raised. No doubt a proposal to raise fares would meet with opposition; it is, however, when made on sufficient grounds, far less unreasonable than a proposal, without the assent of passengers, to limit the amount of compensation recoverable, by exceptional legislation in favour of railway companies. If any company desire to issue tickets at reduced fares, the passenger, in consideration of such reduction, agreeing to take the risk of injury by negligence of the company's servants on himself, by all means let them have power to do so, subject to proper regulations to prevent any passenger being held to have unknowingly made such an agreement.

We see no objection to every company issuing, if they please to do so, tickets at three rates of fares for the same class of carriage. There might be insured, ordinary, and reduced fares. The liability of the company to ordinary passengers might be as at present—viz., to compensate for injuries from negligence of the company or its servants; to insured passengers to compensate for any injury not obviously the act of the passenger; to passengers at reduced fares either to compensate for no injuries at all or only to a limited amount. It would, however, be necessary, if such a practice were introduced, and travelling at reduced fares became general, to enact provisions which would secure some substantial pecuniary penalty sufficient to ensure general carefulness on the part of companies. This we agree might well be done without imposing so extensive a liability as at present. There might be either a limited liability even to "reduced" passengers, or there might be a pecuniary fine, going partly to the informer. If all "reduced" tickets were coloured red, no others being so, and these conditions printed on them, and also the company were bound to give every passenger an ordinary ticket unless he asked for a "reduced" one, this might probably be sufficient to prevent travellers from unknowingly taking risks on themselves, and it might not be necessary to require a signed contract, as for goods on special conditions. Of course companies should have the benefit of any legislation in favour of masters in general, but we protest against their having special legislation, to the injury of individuals, on account of the benefit they are supposed to confer on the public.

We have not now space to go into the question, with which Mr. Brown also deals, as to the desirability of a special tribunal for railway cases, but we have before expressed our disapproval of special legislation on this point also.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

NEWSPAPER COPYRIGHT.

Cox v. "Land and Water Company," V.C.M., 18 W. R. 206.

The owner of a newspaper has, on the authority of this decision, copyright in all articles for which he pays, and which appear in the newspaper, by virtue of the Copyright Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 45), as the owner of a "periodical work" under section 18, and need not register it in order to maintain a suit, a newspaper not being considered a "book" under section 2, so as to render registration necessary.

The protection afforded to the title of a newspaper by registration under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, was quite a different matter, and is now abolished by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24.

We respectfully agree with the Vice-Chancellor that the idea of there being no copyright in a newspaper is repugnant to common honesty. The subject, however, is not one upon which the law is very clear. The weight of authority now, after much judicial conflict, is in favour of the position that copyright after publication has no existence at common law, and is merely a creation of the statute law (Reade v. Conquest, 9 W. R. 434, 9 C. B. N. S.

768, and Jefferys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. Cas. 815). The statute law now applicable is that provided by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 45, which repealed the Act of 6 Anne and some subsequent ones. Whether newspapers come within the purview of any section of this Act is certainly an arguable question, and by no means, in our opinion, so clear as the Vice-Chancellor seems to have regarded it. He holds that there is copyright in a newspaper in respect of all matter for which the proprietor has paid. He deduced this conclusion from the terms of section 18, holding at the same time that a newspaper is not within the purview of section 2, the section which makes registration a requisite. No injunction, of course, can be obtained against the piracy of a work to which that section applies, unless the work has been properly registered as required by that section and section 24.

Vice-Chancellor Malins' decision is, as to its practical result, decidedly consistent with common sense. Whether or not it is sound as an interpretation of the statute is more doubtful.

TENANT FOR LIFE WHERE ENTITLED TO A CHARGE ON THE INHERITANCE FOR PERMANENT IMPROVEMENTS.

Gilliland v. Crawford, V.C. (Ir.), 18 W. R. 60.

In this case the tenant for life had completed houses which the testator had begun to build, and sought to charge the inheritance with the cost of completion. He was executor also, but there was no contract in existence throwing the cost of completion on the testator's assets, and the case was disposed of solely as upon a question between tenant for life and remainderman.

The Court is not disposed to allow the tenant for life to rank as a creditor for improvements effected by him, though of a permanent character, whatever may be their cost, or the benefit to the inheritance. His business is to obtain the sanction of the Court to the outlay, before incurring it, and if he neglects to do so, he will not, in general, be allowed for building, draining, enclosing or making similar improvements at his own cost. Nor will the Court give its opinion upon matters of detail of this description under Lord St. Leonard's Act: Re Barrington's Estate, 8 W. R. 577, 1 Sc. H. 142; but the question must be raised in a suit, or in case of drainage by petition under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56 (the Drainage Act).

The case of a mansion-house completed by the tenant for life is a familiar exception to the rule. Perhaps the leading case is Dent v. Dent 10 W. R. 375, 30 Beav 363, where the tenant for life was allowed his outlay on a mansion-house left unfinished by the testatrix, but not his outlay on rebuilding farm-houses and farm buildings, erecting cottages, and draining marshy ground. Dunne v. Dunne, 10 W. R. 380, 7 D. M. S. 207, is to the same effect. Such improvements may now under the Drainage Acts be charged on the inheritance, but this by the way.

It is easy to see why the case of a mansion-house should be an exception to the general rule. A person coming into possession as tenant for life of an estate with an unfinished mansion-house thereon, can hardly do otherwise than complete it, and his claim, if he does complete it, will be favourably considered by the Court. In Gilliland v. Crawford, the buildings were of a speculative character, and not for occupation, and therefore Hibbert v. Cook (1 Sc. S. 552) did not apply. In Hibbert v. Cook, where a mansion-house had been finished by the tenant for life, it was declared that, if it appeared on enquiry that it was for the benefit of all parties that the mansion-house should have been finished, and there was no personal estate applicable for the purpose, the outlay was to be a charge on the inheritance. But an inquiry as to repairs will not be directed, as they are an incident of the life tenancy: Nairn v. Marjoribanks (3 Russ. 582), where a new roof had been put on the mansion-house at a great expense.

It may be said, moreover, that a tenant for life who voluntarily improves the inheritance is somewhat in the position of a stranger who, if he builds on or otherwise improves land which he knows to belong to another, does so at his own cost and is not entitled to any allowance (Ramsden v. Dyson, 14 W. R. 926, L. R. E. I. App. 168)

Such cases can of course only occur where there is no contract binding the predecessor to complete the work left unfinished at his death. Where such a contract or covenant exists, and the party bound dies before full performance, his estate is liable to complete it: Marshall v. Holloway (5 Sim. 197). This principle had no application in Gilliland v. Crawford, but was the basis of the decision in Cooper v. Jarman (15 W. R. 142, L. R. 3 Eq. 98), where a person having contracted with a builder to erect a house on a piece of freehold land belonging to him died intestate before the house was finished, and it was held that the heir-at-law was entitled to have the house finished at the expense of the personal estate.

COUNTY COURT EQUITABLE JURISDICTION—MORTGAGE.

Powell v. Roberts, V. C. S., 18 W. R. 84.

The County Court Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99 (clause 3 of section 1), confers upon the county courts "all the power and authority" of the Court of Chancery "in all suits for foreclosure and redemption . . . where the mortgage . . . shall not exceed in amount the sum of £500;" and no subsequent Act has interfered with this part of the Equitable jurisdiction of the county courts. The present case decides that a suit by parties claiming through the mortgagor to set aside a sale made by the mortgagee is a "suit for redemption within the meaning of this clause." The plaintiff was issued by a second mortgagee, who alleged that the first mortgagee had improperly exercised his power of sale, whereas the plaintiff was desirous of redeeming. The prayer was that the conveyance to the purchaser might be set aside, and the purchaser ordered to convey to plaintiff on payment of debt and interest; the plaintiff also prayed an injunction, damages, and consequential relief. The county court judge declared the sale to be unauthorised by the power, and, therefore, void as against the plaintiff; and ordered that on payment into court by the plaintiff of principal and interest the first mortgagee should release, and the purchaser convey the property to the plaintiff. Upon an appeal from this decision it was contended (inter alia) that the county court had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaintiff,—that the Act limited the jurisdiction to mere redemption, whereas the plaintiff was to set aside a sale made to a purchaser for value without notice, and could not be regarded as a plaintiff for redemption. In Harvey v. Tebbutt, 1 J. & W. 197, the Court treated a suit to set aside a foreclosure decree as a suit to redeem; and the decision of Vice-Chancellor Stuart is in effect, that the case is not altered by the fact that a sale having been made instead of a foreclosure, the legal estate has got into the hands of a third party, who is therefore a necessary party: Jenkins v. Jones, 8 W. R. 270, 2 Giff. 99, was a similar case. Of course, had the purchaser established that he took without notice, no relief could have been granted against him; the case is not reported on this point, which turned, of course, simply on facts.

RECTIFICATION OF THE REGISTER ON THE APPLICATION OF THE LIQUIDATOR.

Kintrea's case, L. J. G., 18 W. R. 197, L. R. 5 Ch. 95.

The effect of this decision is to restrict the application of Sichel's case (16 W. R. 292, L. R. 3 Ch. 119) to cases where there is no element of what the Court calls fraud. Sichel's case decides that where a name has been left upon the register by the default of the company, the Court will not rectify the register on the application of the liquidator, the ratio decidendi being simply this, that the official liquidator represents the company to whose default the error is owing, and that the creditors have no equity against a person whose name has never been upon the register. In Kintrea's case the transfer was a colourable one, made for the purpose of escaping liability, but it was duly registered. In Sichel's case Lord Cairns, L.J., decided that a company, after failure, cannot come through its liquidator, and ask to remove one name which was on the register, and substitute another, as the liquidator asked in Kintrea's case, on the ground that the company ought to have done so before its failure. This decision, however, in the words of the Lord Justice, does not touch the present case, inasmuch as the state of the register was owing to the deception (using the word in no offensive sense) practised on the company by Kintrea; while in Sichel's case it was owing to the company's own negligence. In Kintrea's case the directors were misled into registering the transfer; in Sichel's case the transfer was not registered owing to their own negligence, and hence the different result of the two cases. The Court will consider that a name is improperly on the register, in the words of the 35th section, when the official liquidator is the applicant, only when the error arises from the company being misled, not when it arises, as in Sichel's case, from the laches of the company.

Another is thus added to the list of cases referred to by Lord Cairns in Smith v. Reese River Company, 17 W. R. 1042, L. R. 4 E. & I. App. 80, where the state of the register is not conclusive at the date of the winding up.

The reader will observe that costs were given against Kintrea, though the 35th section is silent as to the costs of applications made under it, because the proceeding was part of the proceedings in the winding up, so as to come within the General Order as to costs. Had the company been a going concern, it may be doubted whether any order could have been made as to costs. In fact Lord Cairns, L.J., in Ward and Henry's case, 15 W. R. 596, L. R. 2 Ch. 431, expressly said that under the section no costs or damages can be given against the party who is in the wrong.

COMMON LAW.

LIBEL—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—REPORT OF SUPERIOR MILITARY OFFICER REFLECTING ON CHARACTER OF AN INFERIOR OFFICER—MALICE.

Dawkins v. Paulet, Q.B., 18 W. R. 336.

It is a very common defence to an action for defamation that the alleged libel or slander is what is called a privileged communication. It is generally laid down (see Addison on Torts 2nd Ed. p. 683) that when a communication is made by one person to another in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs where his interest is concerned, the communication is privileged; that is, the law will not presume malice, but the plaintiff must prove as a fact that the defendant was actuated by malice. "The occasion prevents the inference of malice which the law draws from unauthorised communications, and affords a qualified defence depending upon the absence of actual malice" (Tougood v. Spyring, 1 C. M. R. 193). The term "privileged communication" is, however, often loosely used in a more extended sense, and there are several distinct grounds of defence to an action for defamation which are usually all classed under this head although in fact they differ much from one another.

In the first place, a wide latitude is allowed in commenting on all public matters, although such comment may be defamatory to an individual; and, consequently, a defamatory statement concerning a minister of state, if restricted to his acts and character as minister, or concerning an actor, author, or composer, is not actionable so long as the statements do not go beyond that which is, as it were, offered to the criticism of the public. "But a line must be drawn between hostile criticism on a man's public conduct and the motives by which that conduct may be supposed to be influenced" (Campbell v. Spottiswoode, 11 W. R. 569). The moment the private, as distinguished from the public character of a man, is attacked, the statements, if defamatory, are actionable. In the same way, fair reports of proceedings in courts of law and of debates in Parliament are not libellous, although they may be defamatory to an individual (Wason v. Walter, Q.B., 17 W. R. 169). Criticisms on public matters are made in the exercise of an absolute right common to the whole public, and not in consequence of any privilege enjoyed by the person making them. If an action is brought for such criticisms, there is no direct issue as to malice or the truth of the opinions expressed, although the malice or untruthfulness may sometimes be important evidence. The sole question is whether the alleged libel is a bona fide comment on matters of public interest; and, if it is a bona fide comment it is not a libel.

Privileged communications, strictly so called, are statements made in cases where the party stands in such a relation to the facts that he is in a position different from that occupied by the rest of the public, and is in consequence of such position privileged, and no action lies unless there is proof of direct malice. The simplest instance of a privileged communication of this kind is when a master gives a character of a servant. The giving of the character, no matter how defamatory and false, is not actionable unless given maliciously (Taylor v. Hawkins, 16 Q.B. 308). It is to this kind of communication that the definition which we gave at the beginning of this notice most properly applies.

There is also another class of cases which falls within the doctrine of privileged communications, but in which that doctrine has been considerably extended. Such are the cases of defamatory statements made by persons in the due course of judicial proceedings, as of a witness in an affidavit (Revis v. Smith, 4 W. R. 506), or by a judge (Scott v. Stansfield, 16 W. R. 911), or by Members of Parliament in their places in either House. In these cases the defamation is absolutely privileged, and even if falsehood and malice be shown there is no right of action.

It is to this last division of privileged communication that Dawkins v. Paulet must be referred. The declaration was for a libel. Plea, that the alleged libel was written by the defendant as the superior military officer of the plaintiff, and in the course of the defendant's duty as such military officer, for the information of the Commander-in-Chief, touching the military conduct of the plaintiff. Replication, that the libel was written with actual malice, without reasonable or justifiable cause, and not bona fide or in the bona fide discharge of the defendant's duties. It was held on demurrer that this replication was bad, and that the defendant was not liable in the action, even if the facts alleged in the replication really existed. The effect therefore of the decision is, in the words of Cockburn, C.J. (who dissented from the opinion of the majority of the Court), "in all matters relating to military authority and discipline a subordinate officer, so far as civil redress is concerned, is entirely at the mercy of his superior; the latter may institute proceedings against him without right or reason on charges which he knows to be unfounded; may, under the disguise of duty, write concerning him that which he knows to be false, and may thus bring upon him consequences the most disastrous without the party injured being entitled to redress in a court of law."

We have before commented upon this decision (ante 149), and we there noticed the few authorities that have been decided upon the point involved in the case. It is only necessary to add now that Dawkins v. Paulet cannot have a very wide direct application as it can only govern similar cases arising in the army or navy, although arguments based upon the analogy of this case may, and doubtless will, be hereafter brought forward in other cases.

RIGHT OF ACTION—PROXIMATE AND REMOTE CAUSE— DAMAGE OCCASIONED BY TWO DISTINCT ACTS OF NEGLECTANCE BY DIFFERENT PERSONS.

Burrows v. The March Gas and Coke Company, Ex. 18
W. R. 348.

The facts in this case were not very clear, but the judgment was given on the assumption that they were as follows:—The defendants contracted to lay down a service pipe for gas from the street into the plaintiff's house, and in carrying out this contract they negligently laid down an insufficient pipe from which gas escaped into the house. A man named Sharratt, not a servant of the plaintiff's or defendants', went to ascertain the cause of the escape of gas and occasioned an explosion by his negligence in carrying a lighted candle in his hand. The plaintiff sought to recover compensation from the defendants for the damage caused by this explosion.

The defendants argued that they were not liable to any action as no damage had been occasioned by their negligence, because the immediate cause of the damage was the negligence of Sharratt. Secondly, even if they were liable to an action it could only be for nominal damages for a breach of contract and that the person who actually occasioned the damage was the only person liable to substantial damages. The Court held that the defendants were liable to substantial damages as their negligence was one of the two efficient causes of the plaintiff's damage. Kelly, C.B., says "the explosion arose from two causes conjointly . . . and the law is if a man employ two different contractors and injuries such as these are occasioned by their joint negligence he can maintain an action against both."

This decision is quite in accordance with the ordinary principles of the law of torts, but the expressions used by Kelly, C.B., must be construed with reference to the facts of this case. Thus read they seem unobjectionable, but if closely examined they will appear not perfectly accurate. The damage in this case was not caused by the "joint negligence" of two persons, but by two distinct and separate acts of negligence, and it was this fact that caused the real difficulty. If there had been a joint act or acts of negligence by Sharratt, and the defendants both or either of them would have been liable. As the acts were not joint the question arose which of the two negligent persons was liable. As the wrongful acts—viz., the negligence—were committed separately, it would seem that both could not be liable either in one or in two actions for the actual damage caused by the explosion. They could not be sued jointly for two distinct acts, and after judgment was recovered against one it would seem that no action would lie against the other for the same damage. It would, therefore, have been more correct to say that each might be liable rather than that both were liable. The plaintiff might have had the option of suing either, but he could not sue both for the same damage. It is possible, however, that both might have been liable to an action under the peculiar facts of this case, although the cause of action would not be quite the same. Sharratt might possibly have been successfully sued for the damage actually done, and the defendants might also perhaps have been liable to the plaintiff for nominal damages for the breach of contract in not supplying a proper pipe. This is not quite clear, but it might be so. These distinctions are not noticed in the judgments, but they should be borne in mind in considering the real meaning and extent of the principle on which the decision is founded.

There was some doubt as to the question of fact whether Sharratt was the plaintiff's servant. Kelly, C.B., said if he had been the defendants would not have been liable, but Martin, B., did not assent to this. As it was found that Sharratt was not the plaintiff's servant this question did not require decision.

On the main point in this case Hill v. The New River Company (18 L. T. N. S. 535) would have been an important authority, but it does not appear to have been cited.

There the defendants negligently allowed water to spout up on a public highway, and the Commissioners of Sewers negligently allowed a ditch made by them to remain improperly fenced. The plaintiff's horses were frightened by the water and swerved into the ditch, and the plaintiff suffered damage. It was found, as a fact, that if there had been no ditch, or if it had been properly fenced, the accident could not have occurred, and also that if there had been no water that the horses would not have swerved into the ditch. It was held that the defendants were liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff, and no question arose as to the liability, if any, of the Commissioners of Sewers. It would seem, however, that the reasoning by which the defendants in Hill v. The New River Company were held liable would also have applied to the Commissioners' negligence, and that there, as in Burrows v. The March Gas &c. Company, the plaintiff had an option to sue either of two independent wrong-doers.

REVIEWS.

Reports of the Decisions of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868. Part III. By E. L. O'MALLEY and H. HARDCASTLE, Barristers-at-Law. London: Stevens & Haynes, Bell-yard, Fleet-street.

In reviewing Parts I. and II. of this publication we explained its nature and value. Part III., now published, contains reports of the remaining cases heard in 1869, and not reported in Parts I. and II., including the Scotch and Irish Cases, as well as the English. Volume I. being now completed, an index to the whole is given, which appears to be a very complete one.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

The present sittings will close on Tuesday next, and the Court will resume on Wednesday, April 20. Lord Justice Gifford will sit at the Privy Council to-day (Saturday), but at Lincoln's-inn on Monday and Tuesday.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

March 12.—Guest v. Smythe.

Sale by the Court—Purchase by solicitor.

This was an application by an adjourned summons to have Mr. Wight, a solicitor, of Dudley, discharged from being the purchaser of one of some lots recently offered for sale by auction in this cause. The suit was originally instituted by a mortgagee and his sub-mortgagee for foreclosure or sale. The mortgagee dying, bills were filed by creditors for the administration of his estate, and Mr. Wight was, at the date of the sale which afterwards took place, the solicitor to the plaintiffs in these creditors' suits, the suit of Guest v. Smythe being carried on by the executrix of the deceased mortgagee. After receiving the mortgage money the executrix would have, after deducting the amount of the mortgage, to account for the balance in the creditors' suits. A sale by auction of the mortgaged property having taken place, Mr. Wight bid on his own account and was declared the purchaser at a price considerably above the reserve. A few days before the sale the plaintiff in one of the creditors' suits had taken out a summons for an order for leave to attend the proceedings in Guest v. Smythe, and an order was obtained on this summons a few days after the day of the sale. Mr. Wight was duly certified as the purchaser, but on taking out a summons to pay his purchase-money into court some three months afterwards, he was met by a summons taken out by one of the parties interested in the suit of Guest v. Smythe, on the mortgagor's side, to have him discharged from his purchase as not a proper person to buy. It was urged on behalf of Mr. Wight that the proceedings were perfectly bona fide, the price was much above the reserve, there had been no concealment whatever, and the party who now objected had herself attended the sale.

It appeared that Mr. Wight had no knowledge that the sale was advertised until he saw the advertisements. He then sent for and distributed some particulars. His name was placed upon the particulars as a solicitor who would give information, but this had been done without his knowledge; he had had nothing to do with the preparations for the sale, and had no knowledge of the reserve price or any of the proceedings. He had been certified as the purchaser, and the certificate had become binding.

Southgate, Q.C., in support of the application.

Swanston, Q.C., and Bevill, for the plaintiffs in Guest v. Smythe.

Jessel, Q.C., and Bagshawe, for Mr. Wight.

LORD ROMILLY, M.R.—I should like to consider a little before I dispose of the case finally, but I will state now what I consider to be the principles affecting a case of this description. I should like to speak to Mr. Hawkins before I finally dispose of the matter. I am not at all clear whether the form of the summons ought not merely to have been to direct a new sale simply, but nothing more, leaving the Court to determine what should afterwards be done. I do not think the confirmation of the sale affects the question, unless there had been a great lapse of time, and acquiescence. But I think the principle is this, and this is how it is laid down by Sir John Leach in a case of Grover v. Hugell (3 Russ. 428).—Was it the duty of Mr. Wight to give his aid for the procuring of the best possible price? That is the question, because if it was his duty to do it then he could not buy. There are various authorities, for instance there is Re Bloye's Trust (1 Mc N. & G. 497). It is expressly laid down that the solicitor who conducts the sale cannot become the purchaser without full explanation to the vendor, and informing him that he (the solicitor) is to become the purchaser. In the course of that case Lord Cottenham refers to what Lord Eldon says—"How can a man if he cannot buy himself give another person authority to buy?" Therefore, the question I have to consider here is first—what was the position of Mr. Wight? I should be very glad to be set right if I misstate his position but, as I understand, Mr. Wight was the solicitor of certain creditors of Mr. Gibbons (the mortgagee), and in that character was employed to take steps for the purpose of intervening in the suit and having some management in the suit, for which purpose he obtains an order, though not till the day after the sale. It was clearly a sale on behalf of the mortgagees and on behalf of the persons interested in the mortgage. It was for the purpose of all the creditors, therefore, and they were as much interested in its being a good sale, in order that it might be sufficient to pay them, as any other person, and Mr. Wight was their solicitor. Now they could not have appointed a person to purchase the property without the leave of the Court. I understand that Mr. Wight applied to intervene on behalf of the creditors. That being so, I should consider that the creditors were parties, and that when his name was added as one of the solicitors for the vendor he was to apply on their behalf and to make the sale as effective as it could be for them. Therefore, I do not think he was in a situation in which he was able to buy. Grover v. Hugell was a very peculiar case. There a person entered into an agreement for the purchase of land, which had been formerly part of the glebe of a rectory and which had been sold for the redemption of the land tax. He was not bound to complete his purchase because it appeared that the rector himself had been the actual purchaser in the name of the curate. I do not think that the fact of being in the name of the curate is anything. What Sir John Leach says is this—"The general rule in equity is that a man cannot place himself in a situation in which his interest conflicts with his duty. The duty of the rector is to obtain the best possible price for the land sold, and his interest as purchaser was to pay the least possible price for it. It is no answer to say that the superintendence of the Commissioners would secure a full price. The sale is to be by public auction, and before two of the Commissioners or some person appointed by them, and their approbation of the sale is required by the Act. But still the duty of the rector was to give his aid to the procuring of the best possible price." I consider that every one of those observations applies to the present case, that it was the duty of Mr. Wight to give all his assistance to the obtaining the best possible price, and that his name was used as one of the solicitors for that purpose. I do not assent to an observation made by Mr. Swanston that where the name of an hotel-keeper is inserted in respect of the place where the sale is to take place, the mere fact of that name appearing upon the particulars of sale would prevent him from buying; when it is stated that information is to be obtained from solicitors, it is to be assumed that they are solicitors for persons interested in the sale—interested in obtaining the highest possible price that can be obtained for it; and I am of opinion that Mr. Wight's duty was, on behalf of the creditors, to obtain the highest possible price and to do everything for that purpose, and that, in that situation, he was not competent to buy. That is my present impression; I will look further into the matter and consult Mr. Hawkins, but that is the view I take of the case, and that is the principle that is laid down by Lord Langdale in Greenlaw v. King (3 Beav. 49), in which he points out upon what principle the question rests. I do not underrate the importance of the question, but it is a question whether a solicitor, whose duty it is to obtain the best possible price, can become a purchaser. In many cases people, upon seeing a person bidding, whose name was put down as one of the solicitors for the vendors, might suppose the property was bought in, and that it was not an effectual sale (I am not in the least referring to the present case). I am, therefore, disposed to think that the proper order will ultimately be to direct a new sale of this property; but in that case it is clear I ought to give leave to amend the summons or to take out another summons for that purpose. I am not at all clear that Mr. Jessel's client would not be entitled to be heard upon that point, but I shall consult Mr. Hawkins about it. If the matter is carried further, which is very likely, as it is a case of very considerable importance, I will put it in such a form that every facility shall be given for anything which you may wish to do.

Ultimately an order was made for a new sale; Mr. Wight not to have power to bid unless in the meantime he should have ceased to be concerned as solicitor.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

March 18.—Re Richard-on.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126—Petition under—Where to be filed.

This was an application on behalf of a debtor who had carried on business at Louth, in Lincolnshire, as a tailor and draper, for leave to file a petition for liquidation by arrangement or composition under the 125th and 126th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, in the London Court of Bankruptcy.

From the affidavit filed in support of the application it appeared that the debtor owed a sum of £241 to creditors, of whom two were resident in London, two in Leeds, two in Manchester, one in Scotland, and two (whose debts amounted to £13 only) in Louth. The assets of the debtor were returned at £230 subject to realisation, and nearly the whole of the creditors were willing that the proceedings should be conducted in this Court. It was alleged that the county court holden at Louth was excluded from jurisdiction in bankruptcy, but at Great Grimsby, some twenty miles distant, the county court had jurisdiction.

Reed in support of the application said it would be for the general convenience of the creditors that the petition should be filed in this Court in preference to the county court at Great Grimsby. He referred to sections 59 and 80 (5th division) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and to the various rules applicable to those sections.

The CHIEF JUDGE in refusing the application said the terms of the statute were very clear in such a case, and he had no jurisdiction to make any order. The present petition should doubtless be prosecuted in London, if the creditors thought fit, but he had no power to order it to be filed here; it was open to the creditors to obtain a transfer to this Court, if necessary.

Solicitors, Stocken & Jupp.

Re Ford.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 125, 126, rule 260—Common Law Procedure Act, 1854—Garnishee order costs.

The debtor, Charles Ford, who had traded at Silvertown, in Essex, and at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, on the 25th February filed a petition for liquidation by composition or arrangement. He had then been sued by the North Kent Bank for a sum of £55 12s. 6d., and on the 3rd March the plaintiff signed judgment in the action for want of an appearance. On the 7th March an order nisi for the attachment of certain funds in the hands of the West Ham Local Board of Health belonging to the defendant was obtained by the plaintiff under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1864, and this order was on the 9th March made absolute. On the 11th inst. the debtor obtained an interim injunction under the 260th rule restraining further proceedings by the plaintiff, and he now asked that it should be made perpetual.

Reed, in support of the application.

Brough, for the plaintiff, submitted that the application should have been made before, and that the debtor ought to have given earlier notice of the filing of the petition for arrangement. It was a hardship that the plaintiff had been allowed to incur further expense in prosecuting his action after the presentation of the petition, and he asked that provision should be made for the extra costs.

The CHIEF JUDGE said it did not appear that any unnecessary delay had taken place, and a receiver had been appointed. The applicant was entitled to a perpetual injunction, and the plaintiff would be at liberty to take the dividend on the amount of his costs, but his Lordship could not make any order for payment in full.

Solicitor for the applicant, J. Langton.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Dale & Stretton.

March 23.—Re Langdon.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 13—Injunction—Sheriff's expenses.

In this case an adjudication of bankruptcy had been obtained against the debtor, and an interim injunction under the 13th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, granted, restraining the execution creditor and the Sheriff of London from proceeding to a sale of the bankrupt's effects.

Mr. Stokes, solicitor (Hawks & Co.), now moved to make the injunction perpetual.

Mr. Angell, solicitor for the execution creditor, objected that no receiver had been appointed, and no person had taken possession in order to protect the property.

Mr. Stokes said it was unnecessary to appoint a receiver; the premises were closed.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—In the case of a bankruptcy it is not necessary to appoint a receiver, for the reason that upon the adjudication taking place the property vests in the registrar.

Mr. Angell asked that some proper person should be placed in possession of the property. If that were done he would raise no further objection.

Mr. Noton, solicitor, as appearing for the sheriff, asked that provision should be made for payment of his expenses.

The CHIEF JUDGE granted a perpetual injunction; but at the same time intimated that it would be convenient for the proper officer to take possession. As to the expenses of the sheriff he had no power to order their payment.

Perpetual injunction accordingly.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

March 17, 18.—Sidebottom v. Earle & Others.

The defendants, Nicholas Earle, Augustus Percy Earle, and Wm. Orford, were solicitors of long standing in Manchester. The plaintiff, Mr. Edward Kershaw Sidebottom, was one of the four sons of the late Mr. Joe Sidebottom, a large cotton spinner at Broadbottom, near Manchester. The present action was brought by the plaintiff for negligently advising him with regard to his rights under his brother John Sidebottom's will. The charge was that in the administration of the assets of John Sidebottom, the plaintiff's brother, Mr. Earle from the beginning to the end advised the plaintiff that he was only a simple contract creditor, when in fact he was not only a specialty creditor but a mortgagee. There were some other counts which did not go to the jury.

Quain, Q.C., Holker, Q.C., and Ambrose for the plaintiff; Manisty, Q.C., and Herschell for the defendants.

His LORDSHIP, in summing up, said the case which the jury had to decide depended on the third count, in which the plaintiff said he was a specialty creditor and executor, and that he had a debt due to him of £12,000, and that there was a chancery suit in which it was necessary to give proof of the nature of his debt and the amount due; and he further alleged that upon the advice of the defendant the nature of his debt was stated in his affidavit to be a simple contract debt instead of a specialty debt, and the amount was set down as £6,200 instead of £12,000. The plaintiff said in consequence of this he was bound to put the debt right, and had had to pay certain expenses for doing it. The first question for the jury to consider was whether the defendant had been guilty of that amount of negligence which it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove in order to maintain this action. It was not sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the advice which the defendant had given him was wrong; it was not sufficient to show that the defendant had made a mistake in point of law in the advice which he had given. If an attorney was to be made liable for any mistake in his advice—that was to say, if he was to be expected to ensure his advice—who would they get to carry on business? His Lordship then proceeded to explain what had been held to be negligence on the part of an attorney such as would justify a jury in giving damages against him. Lord Brougham had laid it down as being gross ignorance, something clearly erroneous—not a mere error or mere negligence; and Lord Campbell held that a professional adviser, before he could be held responsible on such a ground, must be guilty of some misconduct, some fraudulent proceeding, gross negligence, or gross ignorance. Unless the jury were satisfied that the defendant had been guilty of such negligence, they would have to give a verdict for the defendants. Then there had been another charge made against Mr. Earle which he thought could not, and ought not, to be taken into account. It had been suggested that the plaintiff had been advised that he was only a simple contract creditor in order to get the money realised out of the estate put into court, and that then the defendant, as an attorney, would have got his costs. If anything was meant at all by that suggestion, it meant that the defendant had done it on purpose. If it was true, it was a charge of fraud against the defendant, and ought to strike him off the roll of attorneys; but it could not be supposed that an attorney with a grain of respectability would have been guilty of such a course of conduct. If such a charge was to be made against the defendant, there ought to have been a charge of fraud in the declaration, but there was none. Therefore the supposition of fraud must be thrown away.

The jury having deliberated about a minute, returned a verdict for the defendants.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. DONALD MACKENZIE, an advocate of the Scotch Bar has been appointed a Lord of Session, in succession to the late Lord Barclay. The new judge has assumed the title of Lord Mackenzie. His lordship was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and was admitted a member of the Scottish Faculty of Advocates in 1842; he has been sheriff of Fifeshire for many years past.

MR. JOSEPH NEEDHAM, one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, has been gazetted as Chief Justice of the island of Trinidad, in the West Indies, which office has been vacant since the death of the Hon. W. G. Knox several months ago. Mr. Needham was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in May 1846, and formerly practised on the Home Circuit and at the Surrey sessions. In 1865 he was appointed Chief Justice of Vancouver's Island, but on the union of that colony with British Columbia, in 1866, he reverted to the position of a judge of the Supreme Court of the amalgamated colony. The salary of the Chief Justice of Trinidad is £1,800 a year.

MR. JAMES KERNAN, Q.C., of the Irish Bar, has been appointed a Puisne Judge of the High Court of Judicature at Madras, the salary of which office is £4,500 per annum. The vacancy on the Madras Bench has been caused by the retirement of Sir Adam Bittleston, who was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Madras in 1858, and was re-appointed to the High Court, under the new Act, in June, 1862, having thus completed nearly twelve years' judicial service in India. Mr. Kernan was called to the bar in Ireland in Michaelmas Term 1840, and was appointed a Queen's Counsel in August, 1859. Mr. Kernan for some years has practised principally in the Bankruptcy Court.

MR. HENRY PERING PELLEW CREASE, Attorney-General of British Columbia, has been appointed a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of that colony, in succession to Mr. J. Needham, who has been gazetted as Chief Justice of Trinidad. Mr. Crease was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1847; he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in June, 1849, and for some years practised as a conveyancer and equity draughtsman. In July 1861 he was appointed Attorney-General of British Columbia. As Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court, he will receive a salary of £1,200 per annum.

MR. WILLIAM STOTT BANKS, solicitor, of Wakefield, has been appointed Clerk to the magistrates of that borough which has just received a separate commission of the peace.

MR. ROSE FULLER, of the Principal Registry of her Majesty's Court of Probate, London, has been appointed District Registrar for Newcastle-on-Tyne, in succession to Mr. M. L. Jobling, solicitor, deceased. Mr. Fuller has been for several years an assistant in the Correspondence Department of the Court of Probate.

MR. WILLIAM FOWLE, solicitor, of Northallerton, Yorkshire, has been appointed Clerk to the Local Board of Health, and also Clerk to the Commissioners of land, income, and assessed taxes for the division of Allertonshire, in the place of his father, the late Mr. Thomas Fowle.

MR. HENRY MOORING ALDRIDGE, solicitor, of Bournemouth, Hants, has obtained a faculty to practise as a notary public for Poole and Bournemouth, in the room of his father, the late Mr. H. Mooring Aldridge.

MR. WILLIAM HARPER, of Bury, Lancashire, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women in and for the county of Lancaster.

MR. EDWARD HYDE BOOTHROYD, solicitor, of Stockport, Cheshire, has been appointed a Commissioner to Administer Oaths in Chancery.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

MARRIED WOMEN'S ACKNOWLEDGMENTS BILL.

Sir,—This bill is, I see, prepared and brought into Parliament this session by Mr. Dodds and Mr. Goldney. Last session Mr. Goldney's name stood first, but this time it is sought I suppose to disguise it a little from being supposed to be the same bill by putting Mr. Dodd's name first.

At the same time that I admit that the cost of the present acknowledgments might be reduced, I do not think the bill in question is the right way to do it. It proposes that the mere memorandum upon the face of the deed signed by one of the present perpetual commissioners, or a commissioner to administer oaths in chancery in England or London, before whom the acknowledgment is made, "shall be conclusive evidence of such acknowledgment, and that all the provisions of this Act in relation thereto were duly observed and complied with."

Now, after a pretty extensive practice as a perpetual commissioner (I do not know if either Messrs. Dodds or Goldney ever were such commissioners), I have always been of opinion, and still am, that the affidavit accompanying the certificate of acknowledgment (and which the present bill proposes to abolish) was of far greater protection to the married woman than the certificate itself. As you know, Sir, the affidavit is made by a responsible party, a solicitor, who consequently understands it, and it pledges him to the time and place and by whom the certificate was signed, the woman's capability of understanding the matter, whether she has any provision made for her or not (and if any, that it is actually made or agreed in a binding manner to be made), and where the property passed is situated, no one of which matters does the proposed new memorandum prove. Even the very form given in the bill is clumsy and school-boy like: it commences—"This deed was this day produced before me," &c., and no date at all is given or mentioned in the form. Again, read section 3 of the bill, and understand it if you can, it is absolutely without meaning. In fact I regard the whole bill as one of those little tinkering bits of piecemeal legislation not called for until we have a large measure dealing with the transfer of land generally, and as doing more harm than good, and as such I hope to see it again rejected as it was last session.

I quite think the separate office for registering these certificates and affidavits with all the expense of registrar and clerks might be abolished, and the duty attached to the Common Pleas Masters Office, where a couple of clerks could easily do the work which is little more than mere routine, and which might be done by an order of the Court without the necessity of an Act of Parliament. I would still keep up the affidavit (only I would use one form which might be subject to alteration to meet all cases, preserving the essentials required by the Act) with copy memorandum endorsed on the deed annexed, much the same as in the ordinary case of an affidavit with copy writ of summons annexed, and a reduced scale of costs to be fixed by the Court something as follows:—

Drawing and engrossing memorandum on deed	0	3	4
Attending appointing for commissioners attendance	0	3	4
Paid commissioners (10s. 6d each)	1	1	0
Drawing and engrossing affidavits, verifying (including attendance to be sworn, oath and copy memorandum)	0	10	0
Writing office in London therewith to file (no agency charges to be allowed)	0	3	8
Paid for office copy affidavit and correspondence	0	5	0 or even less.

I hope the two Law Societies will well watch the bill.

A PERPETUAL COMMISSIONER.

INSURANCE COMPANIES AND THEIR AMALGAMATIONS.

Sir,—The enormous amount of property affected by the settlement of the law of life insurance companies, induces me once more to trespass on your kindness with a few observations on the recent decisions bearing on this important subject. On reading the note of the judgment of Vice-Chancellor James in Re Manchester and London Life Assurance Association, Ex parte Thompson, as reported in the Weekly Notes, p. 87, it appears to me that the reason assigned by that learned judge were not altogether satisfactory or conclusive. That company was in 1862 amalgamated with the Western, by which latter company receipts were, in 1863 and 1864, passed for the current premiums to the holder of a policy, effected with the Manchester in 1860; and it appeared that, in the heading of these receipts, the fact of the union of the two companies was noticed. In 1865 a further amalgamation with the Albert took place, which was referred to in the receipt passed in that year; and, in 1866 and subsequent years, the receipts were headed simply "Albert Life Assurance Company, 7, Waterloo-place, London, S.W., established 1838." The office of the Manchester had formerly been in Manchester, and the premiums had been paid there till the amalgamation with the Albert. No proof was given of any notice to the policyholder of these changes, except by the form and contents of the receipts. Under these circumstances, his Honour held, first that there was no novation between the policyholder and the Western; and secondly, that notwithstanding the form of the latter receipts and change in the place of payment of the annual premiums, there was no novation between the policyholder and the Albert, inasmuch as the Manchester had been no party to the dealings between the Western and the Albert. At the same time the Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that the Western and the Albert were agents of the Manchester for the purpose of the receipt of the annual premiums, so as to keep the policy alive. I would respectfully submit that unless the terms of the transfer by the Manchester to the Western expressly contemplated the power of the latter to transfer its business to another company, the same principle which would render the non-concurrence of the Manchester in this latter transfer a bar to a novation, would likewise rebut the presumption of agency; and that from the date of the payment of the annual premiums to the Albert, the policy as against the Manchester lapsed. I now further submit that, assuming that the Manchester, upon transferring its business to the Western, constituted the latter its agent to receive the annual premiums on its policies, the retention by the Western in its own hands of the capital thus created to meet the transferred liabilities was of the essence of the contract, so as to exclude any implication of authority to delegate the agency to another company.

I note with satisfaction the affirmation by the Court of Appeal of the decision of Vice-Chancellor James in Nunnely's case; and having regard to the judgment of Lord Justice Giffard in that case, I trust that the decision in Thompson's case (which I observe has been followed by the same learned judge, Vice Chancellor James, in Re Anchor Assurance Company reported in the Times of March 23rd), will be appealed against, and the question of lapse considered as well as novation.

"A BARRISTER."

March 24.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 18.—The Transfer of Land Bill.—The Lord Chancellor introduced the bill on this subject, an explanation of which he proposed to give at the next stage. It contained all the substantial provisions in contemplation respecting the transfer of land, and the clauses as to compensation and other matters of that description would be inserted before the second reading, for which he would not at present fix a day.

The bill was read a first time.

The Metalliferous Mines Bill.—The second reading was postponed till after Easter, in consequence of the introduction in the other House of a Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill, which might render the present measure unnecessary.

The High Court of Justice and Appellate Jurisdiction Bills.—The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading. Having already* given the reasons for the changes proposed, he would now explain the provisions of the first bill. It proposed that the division of law and equity should be at once abolished, and that all the litigation which must necessarily occur where property has so largely increased and such various interests have become established should be brought into one Court and under one system of judicature. This one great Court would consist of all the judges of all the separate Courts; those separate Courts, instead of being divided in their jurisdiction from each other, becoming divisions of the one great Court. The divisions would be made solely for the purpose of expediting the business and dividing the labour, there being no wall of separation between them, and there being a free circulation of judges from one division to any other, so that any business might be performed by any one division, and the reference of any particular business to any one Court would be made by general orders, framed solely with regard to convenience and the despatch of business. At present, proceedings instituted in one Court were often arrested as not being a proper matter for the jurisdiction of that Court, and the cause had to be commenced de novo elsewhere; this would no longer be the case, for if a matter originating in one division of the Court could be more conveniently dealt with by another division, it would so pass without any new proceedings, with their attendant expense and contradiction, being instituted. The bill proposed to vest in one High Court the whole power and authority of the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, the Court of Probate and Divorce, and the Court of Admiralty. At present there were seven judges of the Court of Chancery—viz., the Lord Chancellor, the two Lords Justices of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls, and the three Vice-Chancellors, from each of whom there was an appeal to the Lords Justices; while there were eighteen Common Law judges—viz., six each in the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, besides one in the Court of Probate and one in the Court of Admiralty; making a total of twenty-seven. It was now proposed that the Master of the Rolls should henceforth have an appeal jurisdiction only, being transferred to the Appellate Court (the subject of the second Bill), and the Lord Chancellor, assisted by four other judges, should form one division. Thus the Lords Justices would no longer constitute a portion of the Appeal Court, and the Master of the Rolls would no longer be one of the judges of the Court of Chancery, but their functions would be discharged by the Lord Chancellor and four other judges, originally representing the Court of Equity, but henceforth forming one division of the High Court. There would be three other divisions, each with five judges, the Lord Chief Justice of England being at the head of one, and a Lord President at the head of the other two. There would also be another division, which in the first instance, for the division of labour among the several judges, would consist of the judges of the Courts of Probate and Admiralty, who would be assisted by a third, making three in that division. The total number of judges would thus be twenty-three. The second bill proposed to form a Court of Appeal consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Master of the Rolls, four permanent judges, and three judges to be named yearly by her Majesty for that purpose, who would be judges of the Court of First Instance, but might also sit in the Court of Appeal, which would thus be composed of ten judges. The Commission had recommended ten, whereas he (the Lord Chancellor) had thought nine would be sufficient. But Lord Cairns having suggested that the number ten should be adhered to, since three divisions of the Court might occasionally be required and the Lord Chancellor owing to his other duties might be unable to attend, the Lord Chief Justice of England had been inserted as one of the ten, though he (the Lord Chancellor) still thought two divisions would be sufficient. The High Court would have all the powers and authorities now existing in any one of the courts thus proposed to be moulded into one, and a quorum would meet from time to time to arrange procedure and regulations for all the divisions. The divisions, too, though sitting apart, would have power to interchange judges and to facilitate the conducting of business in one division or the other exactly as the exigencies of the moment might require. The most important power to be given to the High Court was, with reference to framing regulations. The true principle was that Parliament should not entrust to the Court anything concerning the rights of parties between themselves in the subject matter of litigation, for these must be determined by common or statute law, and could only be varied by the authority of Parliament; but what every court ought to be able to do, and what Parliament was singularly incompetent to undertake, was to settle the course of procedure which experience showed from time to time to be the most convenient for the attainment of justice. The Court would be conscious, from its daily experience, of the changes in procedure wanted from time to time, and that procedure would thus be sufficiently elastic. Certain general principles should be pointed out by Parliament as indicating the course any Court should take; the 13th clause empowered the High Court to transfer business from one division to another, and enacted that the procedure in all divisions should, as far as possible, be assimilated, that matters might be referred to referees, and that there should be no appeal to any Court of Appeal superior to the High Court from any interlocutory order made by three or more judges, without special leave of the High Court or of the Superior Court of Appeal. These principles being kept in view, the High Court might safely be allowed to regulate the course of procedure. As to salaries, the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chief Justice would receive their present remuneration. As to the selected judges of the Court of Appeal, holders would retain their present salaries of £7,000, but their position would in future be assimilated to that of the Master of the Rolls, their salaries being £6,000. The salaries of the permanent judges of the Court would be £5,000, reserving, of course, to the present Lord Justice his present £6,000. The reason for fixing £5,000 was that the release from the heavy expenses of circuit, would render that salary an addition of £500 or £600 a year. Ex-Chancellors would receive £5,000 while taking part in the judicial business of the House of Lords. As to the dissatisfaction occasioned by the expense and delay incident to our very complicated system of judicature, which the bill proposed to remedy, he had received a deputation of gentlemen representing the profession of solicitors in Manchester, Liverpool, Newcastle, Sheffield, and Birmingham, who, representing different provincial societies, and expressing, the general feeling of that branch of the profession in those towns, urged that these reforms should be speedily carried into effect. He mentioned this to their honour, for no doubt the effect of the bill would be to expedite the administration of justice, and everything tending to that result tended to diminish the time, labour, and cost to each individual litigant, though not, perhaps, to diminish business, for the present system exercised a deterrent influence. The bill adopted the recommendation of the Commission as to the abolition of the Home Circuit. The second bill took away none of the privileges or authority of the House of Lords, but it empowered their lordships to appoint at the commencement of every session a Judicial Committee, who might sit at any period and would make a report, which would have no binding effect till sanctioned by a vote of the House. This would clear off the present arrears of appeals. There was also a power of obtaining assistance from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, care being taken that in that case there should be a majority of the Committee members of the House of Lords; and the bill likewise provided that such members of the Appellate Court as were Privy Counsellors should be entitled to sit on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as also might the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy if a Privy Counsellor. There would in reality be only one additional Judge, and the present Chief Judge in Bankruptcy would be placed in the position of one of the judges of the divisions of the High Court, as his duties in bankruptcy would not necessarily occupy the whole of his time. In order that the bills might be carefully considered he proposed to postpone the committee for some time.— Lord Westbury had read the bill with some despondency; he heartily agreed with the deputation of solicitors, especially commending their desire for despatch, but he feared the bill gave no promise of that. The existing abuse of divided jurisdiction would remain till the many members of the High Court should have settled the rules. There might be forty years' wandering in the desert before that was done. The equity and common law judges might not agree before the long-promised Palace of Justice was ready. He suggested that the Commissioners should frame the rules at once and report them to the House. They were matters for Parliament to settle. There was a provision that the High Court should have a quorum of seven, and that the quorum of the divisional Courts should not be less than three, but the bill also provided that the divisional Courts should be on an equality with the High Court, and should exercise all its authority; and by clause 6 the authority of the High Court was actually given to one judge. The multiplication of Courts of Appeal was another blot. There was an appeal from the Divisional Court to the High Court, appeal No. 1; an appeal from the High Court to the Court of Appeal, appeal No. 2; and finally, an appeal from that Court to the Ultimate Court of Appeal. It might take eight or ten years before a cause got finally settled. There was a matter which he did not see provided for in the bill—the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor to grant injunctions to meet or prevent some extraordinary evil or imminent injury. It was at present exercised very conveniently and satisfactorily; for if an injunction was granted or refused by one of the Vice-Chancellors in a matter where two or three days' delay might produce much mischief, the unsuccessful litigant appealed to the Lord Chancellor's Court, and if the case was an urgent one the appeal was determined in a few days. He wished also to know why jurisdiction in bankruptcy was not transferred to the High Court; the 4th clause in the first bill transferred everything else, and yet the judge of the Bankruptcy Court was to be made a Vice-Chancellor. He hoped the Government would not appoint too aged men to the office of judges. In America the retirement was at sixty-six, and at seventy there was an undoubted decline of judicial ability. He should be most happy to aid in removing the blots he had pointed out, and suggested that the bill should be referred to a Select Committee.— Lord Penzance was glad the bill had so faithfully reproduced the ideas of the Commission. He thought the framing of the rules had been judiciously entrusted to the judges, who could produce them much more expeditiously than the plan suggested by Lord Westbury. Nor did he agree that there would be that multiplication of appeals which Lord Westbury apprehended. There would be an appeal from the High Court to the Court of Appeal, and the ultimate appeal to the House of Lords was untouched; the clause which Lord Westbury read as giving an appeal to the High Court he read merely as providing for a rehearing on further evidence. He would remark on what he thought the great merit of the bill. It was a grievance that the common law courts had but one remedy to award—viz., damages; it was another grievance that those courts had no form of trial other than trial by jury, however ludicrously inappropriate (as, for instance, in patent, engineering, or ship-collision cases); under the bill these cases could at once be referred to a proper tribunal. The bill also met the great evil of divided equity and common law jurisdiction. But it could not be expected that that distinction should disappear as soon as the bill became law. That must take a long time; the two systems had grown up side by side. The judges on one side of Westminster Hall were more or less ignorant of the practice of the judges on the other side. The bar was divided into common law and equity barristers; the attorneys were divided, so that there was scarcely a respectable attorney's office in which there was not one clerk for equity and another for common law. It would be vain, therefore, to expect any new arrangement to get rid at once of a difficulty so gradually created, and which had brought about so marked a distinction between the two branches of the legal profession. But the bill would do all that any legislative measure could effect in that direction. The bill did not propose to throw all the business together to be taken haphazard. There would be a marked difference between the classes of cases sent to the courts of law and the courts of equity respectively. In the courts of common law the questions in dispute between the parties were almost invariably questions of disputed facts; and for the ascertainment of a disputed fact there was no trial equal to one at common law in an open court. The courts of equity were engaged, for the most part, in the investigation of matters of a totally different character, suits of administration, the construction of wills, the winding up of bankrupt companies, and matters of account, and trust property, therefore, the bill provided for the re-distribution by which the class of business which flows into the common law courts should find its way to the common law division, and the class of business which flows into the courts of equity should find its way to the equity division of the court. As to the question of appeals the bill hardly constituted the Court of Appeal as the Commission intended it should be done. The Commission reported that it should consist of the Lord Chancellor, two Lords Justices, the Master of the Rolls, and three permanent Judges; and certainly it was not in the contemplation of the Commission that, instead of two Lord Justices, only one should be retained, and that his salary should be reduced, subject to existing life interest. But matters of detail would be more properly dealt with in Committee.—Lord Romilly disputed Lord Penzance's assertion that the courts of equity did not decide questions of fact. If the distinction between law and equity was inevitable you could never fuse them. Why should not the Court of Chancery determine questions of fact in the manner most suitable for the purpose; and why should not a court of law decide the construction of a will as well as the Court of Chancery? Again, it had been asked whether there would not be a great number of appeals under the bill, and Lord Penzance said they were not appeals, but re-hearings. But if an appeal was bad, a re-hearing was ten times worse.—Lord Chelmsford approved the bill in the main, but thought it had been brought forward in an imperfect shape. He agreed it was better that the judges should frame the rules than Parliament, but he preferred the Commissioners: he cited the precedent of the Common Law Procedure Act. As to the appellate jurisdiction, he had no objection to calling in the members of the Privy Council as assessors, but he had a great objection to putting them exactly in the same position as the members of the Judicial Committee of the House, making them to all intents and purposes peers pro hac vice. He regretted that when the bill was introduced it was not proposed to constitute one great Court of Appeal, consisting of judges of high dignity, who might receive the cases which now come before the two high Courts of appeal—the Privy Council and the House of Lords. That would be infinitely better than preserving the appearance to this House of having authority over questions of appeal, and indirectly undermining that authority.

The Lord Chancellor having replied, the bill was read a second time.

March 24.—The Habitual Criminals Act.—In reply to Earl Carnarvon, Earl Kimberley said the Government were going to bring in a bill to amend this Act.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

March 18.—The Education Bill was read a second time.

The Judges Jurisdiction Bill passed through committee.

Real Estate Succession Bill.—The Attorney-General introduced a bill intended to assimilate the law of succession to reality to that of succession to personality.

March 19.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—Mr. G. H. Moore opposed the second reading. It was unnecessary, because the ordinary legal powers had not been tried, and would never effect its purpose. Common murders and brigandage ought not to be dealt with by means appropriate only to political disturbance.—Mr. Cullen also opposed the bill. It mixed up politics with agrarian disturbances; the ordinary powers were sufficient and the press clauses were objectionable.—Mr. Newdegate said the bill was a feeble copy of the Insurrection Act of 1833, and rendered necessary by the state of Ireland as complicated by the mistaken policy of the Government.—Mr. Sanderson supported the bill, and said if its powers were not strong enough the Government could come again and ask for more.—Colonel Wilson-Patten did not dare to oppose the bill during a Reign of Terror. But the present powers had not been tried, and if more was wanted it should have been asked for before.—The Solicitor-General for Ireland said there was a crisis. If the bill was tried and failed, the Government would ask for more.—Mr. Bagwell said it would be mischievous and futile.—Mr. Synan denounced the press clauses.—Lord C. Hamilton supported the bill, but it would be useless unless followed up by vigorous impartial action.—Mr. Stapoole opposed it as a temporary nostrum.—Mr. J. Lowther called it inadequate.—Mr. Maguire called it too severe, especially on the press.—Dr. Ball cordially supported it as efficacious though stringent.—Mr. Horsman said a coercion bill was a stale old plan.—Mr. Henley said the bill was wanted, but had been wanted long before.—Debate adjourned.

Capital Sentences.—Sir C. Jenkinson introduced a bill to amend the law as to the commutation of capital sentences. The country had a right to know why sentences were commuted, and nothing tended so much to diminish the respect of the lower classes of the people for the administration of justice as not to be informed why one person was hung for the crime of murder and another not.

The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—Adjourned debate on the second reading.—Mr. Downing said the bill was unnecessary, unconstitutional, and inquisitorial.—Lord J. Manners cordially supported it as an efficacious measure; the evil, however, should have been grafted with before. In its operation the bill would be hampered by want of confidence between executive and magistracy.—Mr. Chichester said there was no such lack of confidence; the bill was necessary and not too stringent, and the delay had merely smoothed the way.—Sir T. Bateson supported the bill, but blamed the Government for dilatoriness.—Mr. McMahon said the outrages were owing to the bad Irish land law now about to be remedied, and objected to the bill because it never would have been proposed for England or Scotland.—Mr. K. Digby said it would be cruel and would do no good.—Mr. Kavanagh thought it should pass before more blood was shed.—Serjeant Sherlock supported the bill, except the press clauses.—Mr. Murphy would leave mere seditious writing to the ordinary law, while dealing most summarily with incitements to murder.—Lord C. J. Hamilton supported the bill on account of the press provisions, which ought to have been brought in before.—Mr. Agar-Ellis thought it not too stringent, and implored the Government to enforce it inexorably.—Mr. Whalley thought it waste of time to discuss such an ineffective measure—let them send out instead a band of Murphy-lecturers to convince the people.—Mr. Bryan thought some force was necessary, but opposed the bill for the powers it gave the magistracy.—Mr. Conolly said, suspend the Habeas Corpus Act.—Mr. White approved the object but condemned the details and would oppose the bill.—Colonel White condemned the details but approved the object, and would vote for the second reading.—Mr. Gladstone, in reply, said the existing law was inadequate for dealing with the press. As to the delay, it was a nice question to determine precisely when such a measure should be brought forward. Temporary measures of coercion would be requisite, but in the end the grand remedial measures would attain their end.—Second reading carried by a majority of 425 to 13.

The Judges Jurisdiction Bill was read a third time and passed.

March 23.—The Burials Bill.—Mr. O. Morgan moved the second reading of this bill, the object of which was to empower Dissenters to bury their dead in churchyards, and with their own services. After a considerable debate the second reading was carried by a majority of 233 to 122, and, by a majority of 226 to 135, the bill was referred, against the will of the introducer, to a select committee.

March 24.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—Committee.—An amendment to clause 7, reducing the punishment for carrying arms in a proclaimed district from two to one year's imprisonment, was rejected by a majority of 333 to 31. Clause 13 (power to magistrates in proclaimed districts where felony has been committed, to examine witnesses though no person has been charged with the offence); an amendment requiring that some person shall have been actually charged before such powers become exercisable, was rejected by a majority of 161 to 16.—Clause 26 (power to the Attorney-General to change venue of indictment in proclaimed county) was amended by transferring to the Court of Queen's Bench the power to name the county for trial of offences under the Act, and empowering the court to sit in vacation for the purposes of the Act.—Clause 27 (the first of the press clauses); several proposals to omit all mention of sedition were negatived, and the debate was then adjourned.

The Churchwardens Bill was read a second time.

IRELAND.

CONSOLIDATED COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice GEORGE.)

March 21.—Re Little, a Solicitor.

Hammond, for Mr. H. Little, solicitor, Armagh, applied that the Incorporated Law Society be authorised to grant the usual license to his client. Mr. Little had been a solicitor for twenty-five years, but owing to ill health had not taken out the license in 1868. He denied that he had practised, except in a few cases at the petty sessions court.

Shelton, for the Incorporated Law Society, observed that Mr. Little had not stated that he had not practised as a conveyancer in the Landed Estates Court.

His LORDSHIP fined Mr. Little £2 and ordered him to take a license for the year 1869.

OBITUARY.

DR. E. W. ROWDEN.

The death of Edward Wetherell Rowden, D.C.L., Registrar of the University of Oxford, took place at St. Giles's, Oxford, on the 18th of March, after an illness of about a month's duration. The late Dr. Rowden, who was on the rolls as an attorney of Oxford, was the eldest son of the Rev. Edward Rowden, M.A., Vicar of Highworth, Wilts, and was born on the 15th of August, 1814. At the age of twelve he entered Winchester School, in his right of founder's kin, and afterwards proceeded to the University of Oxford, where he graduated in 1838. He was subsequently elected a fellow of New College, and received the degree of D.C.L. In 1853, on the resignation of Dr. Bliss, he was elected Registrar of the University, and was appointed a notary public in 1855. He was also registrar of the Chancellor's Court, and likewise held the office of Clerk of the Market, in conjunction with Mr. Charles Neate, M.A., barrister-at-law, M.P. for Oxford. Dr. Rowden has left a widow, two sons and three daughters.

MR. E. DENISON.

We have to announce the death of Mr. Edward Denison, barrister-at-law, and M.P. for Newark, who expired on the 26th January last, at Melbourne, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health. Mr. Denison was a son of the late Right Rev. Dr. E. Denison, Bishop of Salisbury, and nephew to the Right Hon. J. E. Denison, Speaker to the House of Commons. He was born in September 1840, and was educated at Eton and at Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1865; he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in January 1868, and in November of that year was elected M.P. for Newark.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS

THE LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the society, held on the 22nd inst., Mr. Hargreaves in the chair, the following question was discussed:—"A, a general officer in the army, writes to the Adjutant-General a report concerning the conduct of B, an officer under his command. It is admitted that the report is libellous, written without probable or justifiable cause, and not in the bona fide discharge of A's duty. Can B. maintain an action against A. in respect of the libel?" Mr. Hills opened the question in the affirmative, and was followed by nine other speakers. The president summed up and put the question to the society, when it appeared that the votes on either side were equal. The president then gave his casting vote in the negative, in which view the question was declared to be carried.

COURT PAPERS.

CHANCERY VACATION NOTICE.

March 21, 1870.

During the Easter Vacation all applications to the Court of Chancery which are of an urgent nature, are to be made to or at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor Sir William Milbourn James.

All applications ex parte are to be sent to the Vice-Chancellor James by book-post or parcel, prepaid, accompanied with the brief of counsel, endorsed with the terms of the order applied for, and an envelope capable of receiving the papers to be returned, with sufficient stamps affixed thereon, and addressed as follows: "To the Registrar in Vacation, Chancery Registrar's Office, Chancery-lane, London, W.C."

On applications for injunctions or writs of Re Excat Regno, there must be sent, in addition to the above, a copy of the bill, a certificate of bill filed, and office copies of the affidavits in support of the application.

The papers sent to the Vice-Chancellor, with any order his Honour may make thereon, will be returned direct to the registrar.

All applications for leave to give notice of motion only, may be made to the chief clerk at chambers.

The Vice-Chancellor's address can be obtained at his Honour's chambers, 11, New-square, Lincoln's-inn.

The chambers of the Vice-Chancellor James will be open on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday in every week, from eleven till one o'clock.

During the Easter Vacation, until further notice, all applications which are necessary to be made at the Judges' Chambers, are to be made at the chambers of the Vice-Chancellor James.

Parties desiring to make any urgent special application to the Court during the vacation are to apply at the said chambers for an appointment.

"RIGHTS OF WOMEN" IN AMERICA.

Mrs. Myra Bradwell, the editress of the Chicago Legal News, has recently, after passing the necessary examination, applied to the Supreme Court of Illinois to be admitted to the bar. The following reply was returned to Mrs. Bradwell's petition:—

"The court are compelled to deny your application for a license to practice as an attorney-at-law in the courts of this State, upon the ground that you would not be bound by the obligations necessary to be assumed where the relation of attorney and client shall exist, by reason of the disability imposed by your married condition—it being assumed that you are a married woman. Applications of the same character have occasionally been made by persons under twenty-one years of age, and have always been denied upon the same ground—that they are not bound by their contracts, being under a legal disability in that regard. Until such disability shall be removed by legislation, the court regards itself powerless to grant your application."

Mrs. Bradwell then filed a further "brief" in the matter, in which she urged that her coverture did not disqualify her.

From the proceedings in the cases reported in the Chicago Legal News it would seem that in Illinois the arguments, both of law and of fact, in support of applications for admission may be stated in the petition or "brief" filed and presented to the court, instead of being delivered orally. After an interval of some months, the court delivered a second opinion adverse to the application. The court say:—

"We do not now propose to consider how far the law of the last session of the Legislature, which gives to married women the separate control of their earnings, extends the power of a married woman to contract, since, after further consultation in regard to this application, we find ourselves constrained to hold that the sex of the applicant, independently of coverture, is, as our law now stands, a sufficient reason for not granting this license. . . . That God designed the sexes to occupy different spheres of action, and that it belonged to men to make, apply and execute the laws, was regarded as an almost axiomatic truth. It may have been a radical error, and we are by no means certain it was not, but that this was the universal belief certainly admits of no denial. A direct participation in the affairs of Government in even the most elementary form, namely, the right of suffrage, was not then claimed, and has not yet been conceded, unless recently in one of the newly-settled territories of the West. In view of these facts, we are certainly warranted in saying that when the Legislature gave to this Court the power of granting licenses to practice law, it was with not the slightest expectation that this privilege would be extended equally to men and women. Neither has there been any legislation since that period which would justify us in presuming a change in the legislative intent. Our laws to day, in regard to women, are substantially what they have always been, except in the change wrought by the Acts of 1861 and 1869, giving to married women the right to control their own property and earnings. Whatever, then, may be our individual opinions as to the admission of women to the bar, we do not deem ourselves at liberty to exercise our power in a mode never contemplated by the Legislature, and inconsistent with the usages of courts of the common law from the origin of the system to the present day. But it is not merely an immense innovation in our own usages as a court that we are asked to make. This step, if taken by us, would mean that, in the opinion of this tribunal, every civil office in this state may be filled by women—that it is in harmony with the spirit of our constitution and laws that women should be made governors, judges, and sheriffs. This we are not yet prepared to hold.

"In conclusion we would hold that, while we are constrained to refuse this application, we respect the motive which prompts it, and we entertain a profound sympathy with those efforts which are being so widely made to reasonably enlarge the field for the exercise of woman's industry and talent. While those theories which are popularly known as "woman's rights" cannot be expected to meet with a very cordial acceptance among the members of a profession which, more than any other, inclines its followers, if not to stand immovable upon the ancient ways, at least to make no hot haste in measures of reform, still all right-minded men must gladly see new spheres of action open to woman, and greater inducements offered her to seek the highest and widest culture. There are some departments of the legal profession in which she can appropriately labour. Whether, on the other hand, to engage in the hot strifes of the bar, in the presence of the public, and with momentous verdicts the prizes of the struggle, would not tend to destroy the deference and delicacy with which it is the pride of our ruder sex to treat her, is a matter certainly worthy of her consideration. But the important question is, what effect the presence of women as barristers in our courts would have upon the administration of justice, and the question can be satisfactorily answered only in the light of experience. If the Legislature shall choose to remove the existing barriers and authorise us to issue licenses equally to men and women, we shall cheerfully obey, trusting to the good sense and sound judgment of women themselves to seek those departments of the practice in which they can labour without reasonable objection.

"Application denied."

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—The anniversary meeting of this society will be held on Wednesday, the 30th of March, at 8 o'clock p.m., precisely. The Right Hon. Lord Westbury will preside and deliver the annual address.

The Huddersfield Town Council have forwarded a recommendation to the Home Secretary that the clerk to the borough justices be paid by salary and not by fees; and that the amount of the salary be fixed at £400 per annum, besides out-of-pocket expenses.

The office of Registrar of the University of Oxford has been rendered vacant by the death of Dr. E. W. Rowden. The emoluments of the registrar were formerly very considerable, but the stipend of Dr. Rowden's successor has been fixed by statute at £500 per annum. The appointment is in the gift of Convocation, and the registrar must be a Master of Arts or a Bachelor of Civil Law, and a Notary Public. He attends all meetings of the Hebdomadal Council and of Convocation, and registers all acts and documents to which the common seal of the University is affixed.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

The funds have been strong this week, and have received a further impetus from some large purchases believed to be on public account. Railways also have been very buoyant. The Indian Guaranteed Stocks are a trifle more in request this week. The foreign market has been strong this week and prices are still maintained, though but little business is done.

At the first annual meeting of the Britannia Fire Association held at the company's offices on Thursday, it was reported that the income for the year had amounted to £7,094, and the losses to £658. A dividend was declared at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The report of the directors of the Briton Medical and General Life Association announces the issue during the past year of 2,224 new policies, the premiums upon which amount to £20,706.

The prospectus of the Cafarthia Lead Mining Company (Limited) has been issued. The capital is £15,000 in 5,000 shares of £5 each, 6,000 being offered for subscription. The object of the company is to purchase and work the Cafarthia lead mines in the county of Montgomery.

The Attorney-Generalship of British Columbia, with a seat in the Legislative Council of that colony, has become vacant by the promotion of Mr. H. P. P. Crease to be a puisne judge of the Supreme Court. The office is worth £500 per annum, and is in the gift of the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

By the death of Mr. Wm. Bakewell, which took place at Adelaide, on the 25th January, the office of Crown solicitor for the colony of South Australia is rendered vacant. It is worth £600 a year, and will be filled up by the local government. Mr. Bakewell's predecessor was Mr. W. A. Wearing, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, who was appointed third judge of the Supreme Court in 1868.

Mr. E. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen, M.P. for Sandwich, and Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, has been elected chairman of the East Kent Quarter Sessions, vice Lord Fitzwalter, resigned.

Mr. Cooper Abbs, solicitor, and clerk to the justices for Sunderland, has resigned the office of clerk to the Monkwearmouth Local Board.

(Gazetted August 8th, 1837—December 31st, 1867.)
277, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

To Trustees, Capitalists, and others.—Thoroughly well-secured Freehold Ground rents, amounting to about $568 14s. per annum.

MR. WRAY will offer for SALE by AUCTION, at the MART, Tokenhouse-yard, on WEDNESDAY, the 30th MARCH next, at TWO o'clock, thoroughly well-secured FREEHOLD GROUND RENTS, amounting to £568 14s. per annum, arising from 73 private dwelling-houses and two shops, well situated at Hornsey, Stamford-hill, and Tottenham; estimated rack rental about £2,650; above £20,000 has been lent upon the leasehold interest alone, while above £27,500 has been actually expended on the building, irrespective of the cost of the land, leaving it beyond doubt that they are most amply secured.

For particulars and conditions of sale apply to Messrs. RUSSELL, SON, & SCOTT, Solicitors, 14, Old Jewry-chambers, City, and also of Dartford, Kent; at the Auction Mart; and at the Auctioneer's offices, 10, Lincoln's-inn-fields, W.C.

To Trustees, Capitalists, and others.—A very important Freehold Investment, almost equal to a ground rent.

MR. WRAY has been favoured with instructions to offer for SALE by AUCTION, at the MART, Tokenhouse-yard, on WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, at TWO o'clock, the very important FREEHOLD BUSINESS PREMISES, situate and being No. 19a, Curator-street, Chancery-lane, in the very heart of this important locality, and in close proximity with the new law courts. The property is at present let on lease, which can be determined on the 25th March, 1871, at the very inadequate rent of £100 per annum, in consideration of the lessee having laid out a large sum in substantial repairs; a much larger rental may then be confidently relied upon.

For particulars and conditions of sale apply to Messrs. RUSSELL, SON, & SCOTT, Solicitors, 14, Old Jewry-chambers, City, and of Dartford, Kent; on the premises, which may be viewed; at the Auction Mart; and at the Auctioneer's offices, 10, Lincoln's-inn-fields, W.C.

To Trustees, Capitalists, Speculators in House Property, and others.—The following investments offer unusually favourable opportunities for making sound Investments, and some of the leasehold properties will be sold to pay a high rate of interest.

MR. WRAY will submit for SALE by public AUCTION, at the MART, Tokenhouse-yard, near the Bank of England, on WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, at TWO o'clock precisely, the following very desirable and important INVESTMENTS:—

HORNSEY.—Three Houses, well-built and finished, in Myddelton-road (Campsbourne-park Estate), near the church, railway-station, and Alexandra Palace and Park, estimated to produce £105 per annum; term 99 years; ground rent moderate.

HORNSEY.—To Carpenters.—Eight well-built Carcases in Brook-road, Muswell-road (Campsbourne-park Estate), Hornsey, near the old church and railway-station, in a very forward state; separate leases direct from the freeholder; term 99 years; moderate ground rents.

STAMFORD-HILL (between the toll-gate and railway-bridge).—Two capital Shops (one a commanding corner one, the other fitted with a 12-bushel oven for a baker's business) and Seven Villa Residences; term 99 years; separate leases at moderate ground rents.

For particulars and conditions of all the foregoing properties apply to Messrs. RUSSELL, SON, & SCOTT, solicitors, 14, Old Jewry-chambers, City, and of Dartford, Kent.

HORNSEY (by absolute order of the Mortgagees).—Two Houses (a pair), in Westfield-road (St. Mary Nursery Estate), near the Three Compasses Tavern, one let at £38, the other in hand; term 99 years; ground rent moderate. A very favourable chance of buying two houses for occupation and investments.—For particulars and conditions of sale apply to Messrs. CONBOLD & PATTERSON, solicitors, 17 & 18, New Bridge-street, Blackfriars.

PECKHAM-RYE (7 & 8, St. Dunstan-road, Forest-hill-road).—Two Houses (a pair), one let at £35; ground rent, £4 each; separate lease direct from the freeholder.

Unusually favourable opportunities offered for payments by instalments, extending over 14 or 21 years, as to this property, upon payment of a deposit of 20 per cent.—Particulars and conditions of sale for this property to be obtained of BLIMPUL & BURNALL, Esqs., solicitors, 10, Fenchurch-buildings, Fenchurch-street, City.

Particulars and conditions of sale of all the foregoing properties may also be obtained on the premises: at the Auction Mart, Tokenhouse-yard, near the Bank of England; and at the Auctioneer's offices, 10, Lincoln's-inn-fields, W.C.

MESSRS. DEBENHAM, TEWSON & FARMER'S MARCH LIST of ESTATES and HOUSES, including landed estates, town and country residences, hunting and shooting quarters, farms, ground-rents, rent-charges, house property, and investments generally, may be obtained, free of charge, at their offices, 80, Cheapside, E.C., or by post for two stamps. Particulars for insertion in the April List must be received by the 28th March at latest.

LONDON, APRIL 2, 1870.

THE TRIAL OF DR. KINGLAKE at the Somerset Assizes last week raised some interesting and important questions of law upon which it is probable that the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench will be asked next term. He was indicted, along with a Bridgwater attorney, Mr. Lovibond, for conspiring to bribe Bridgwater voters at the general election of 1868. Lovibond was examined before the commission of inquiry which sat at Bridgwater last autumn, and it was chiefly in consequence of the disclosures wrung from him by Mr. Anstey and his colleagues that Dr. Kinglake and himself were placed upon their trial. The Commissioners declined to examine Dr. Kinglake, having obtained ample information about the venality of the wretched constituency of Bridgwater without having recourse to his evidence. They reported strongly against both Kinglake and Lovibond, and the Attorney-General, acting upon their report, filed against both the information which has just been tried. Lovibond, however, appeared, not as a defendant, but as a witness. The commission, according to the opinion of the Chief Justice of England, had treated him with harshness in refusing him a certificate of indemnity, and a nolle prosequi was thereupon entered with regard to him. Dr. Kinglake was proceeded against alone for conspiracy with Lovibond, and it was chiefly, if not entirely, upon the evidence of Lovibond that he was convicted.

Upon his being called upon to answer, Lovibond took several objections to doing so. First of all he claimed protection on the ground that his answers would criminate him, he not having as yet received a certificate of indemnity from the commissioners. We may observe in passing that the certificate would not have furnished him with any effectual protection. It is a bar to proceedings under the Corrupt Practices Acts, and under these only, and persons who have received it are still liable to indictments at common law for bribery or conspiracy to bribe. (See 26 Vict. c. 29, s. 7.) Lovibond's objection on this score was cured by a free pardon being presented him for all offences, whether by statute or common law, of which he might have been guilty at the election of 1868. A further objection however was taken. Several actions for penalties are actually pending against him at the suit of a private informer, and he informed Mr. Justice Hannen that he was advised that the pardon would have no effect upon them, and, therefore, that his answers might, in spite of the pardon, subject him to penalties. The judge, after taking a considerable time for consideration, decided that the witness must answer, and his evidence was fatal to Dr. Kinglake's chance of acquittal.

The question is an important and a somewhat doubtful one. That the pardon could not affect penal actions already pending at the suit of a private individual is undoubtedly true (Comyn's Digest, title Pardon), so that the question simply is—whether an action for penalties under the Corrupt Practices Act, 1854, subjects the defendant to "penalties" in the sense which entitles him to the privilege of silence. No decision upon the language of the particular statute exists, but there are several upon that of analogous acts. For example, the old Stook-jobbing Act (7 Geo. 2, c. 28), which is now repealed, subjected offenders against its provisions to pecuniary penalties, to be recovered by action or information. The liability of a witness to such a penalty was held by Lord Tenterden to excuse him from answering. (See Dandridge v. Corden, 3 Carr. & Payne, 11.) Mr. Justice Hannen was of opinion that the liability of Lovibond in the actions pending against him was really for a mere civil debt and certainly we should hesitate to pronounce so learned and able a judge wrong. At the same time the language of the Corrupt Practices Act seems to regard the sums recoverable as absolutely penal, although it is true that they are recoverable by civil process. (See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, ss. 2, 14, and 26 Vict. c. 29, s. 5.) The point is surrounded with many difficulties, and in the event of a new trial being applied for on the part of Dr. Kinglake, on the ground of the misreception of evidence, an interesting discussion may be anticipated.

THE ONLY SATISFACTORY FEATURE in the recent trial at Tours seems to have been the richly-deserved committal of M. Fonvielle for contempt of court. The inquiry was not conducted so as to command confidence, but as far as concerns the merits of the whole affair, neither the Prince nor M. Noir nor M. Fonvielle commands any sympathy from us. An English jury would probably have believed neither the Prince nor M. Fonvielle. The opinion has been widely expressed in France that the institution which has just been revived must, after the late trial, fall for ever into desuetude.

In France all criminal prosecutions for offences coming under the designation of crimes in the French Penal Code must of necessity be brought and carried on by the parquet, or office, of the prosecutor of the Crown, of which the Procureur Imperial in the tribunals of first instance, the Procureur General in the Imperial courts or courts of appeal, is the head. Prosecutions for offences of the inferior degree called delits, a designation which may be rendered by the English term misdemeanour, are not of necessity conducted by the Prosecutors of the Crown. They may be initiated and carried through by the aggrieved parties themselves. But the Procureur Imperial may, if he chooses, make such minor offences the subject of an official prosecution. Wherever the Prosecutors of the Crown take up the case the action of the aggrieved party can only be auxiliary. He may co-operate with the official prosecutor in the course of the information, and bring the case to trial on his own responsibility before the tribunal of correctional police, where the alleged offence is a delit within certain limits. Where the offence is a crime, on the contrary, he is, so far as the criminal prosecution is concerned, entirely dependent on the public prosecutor. The law has provided, it is true, means for compelling the public prosecutor to act, but the private prosecutor, or partie civile, cannot bring the matter into the Court of Assizes, without his co-operation. During the trial the efforts of the Procureur Imperial and the partie civile tend to one common result, the conviction of the prisoner, but with different views and interests. The public prosecutor sues in the name of the public of whom he is the representative or minister (ministere public), for a penalty which will satisfy the law, and secure public order. The private prosecutor seeks for a verdict which will be the basis of the demand which he will lay before the Court, for compensation for the tort committed by the prisoner. When the jury has answered the joint demands of the two prosecutors by a verdict of guilty, the actions separate. Each has a demand upon the Court, but for different objects. The public prosecutor requires from the Court a sentence, and the application of the penalty provided by the law against the offender. The private prosecutor demands the assessment of the damages due to him, and a condemnation against the prisoner for the amount; for, contrary to what takes place under the English law, in France the damages are assessed not by the jury, but by the Court. When the accused is convicted there is no difficulty for partie civile. His main issue has been established by the verdict of guilty. But where the verdict is favourable to the prisoner very great difficulties sometimes arise with respect to the effect it should have on the action of the partie civile. The greatest authorities have been divided as to the question whether the claim of the partie civile was not absolutely barred by a verdict of not guilty. The difficulty arises from the manner in which the questions are put to the jury upon each count of the acte d'accusation,—thus, "Is the accused guilty of having committed such a crime with all the circumstances stated in the summary of the Acts of Accusation?" If the answer be "not guilty," it may be complex in its imports, and deny both the existence of the material facts upon which the accusation is grounded, and the participation of the prisoner therein, in the degree and manner necessary to constitute the criminal offence with which he is charged; or it may simply convey that, in the opinion of the jury, the latter element, the guilty participation, is wanting. Now, in a great many cases, an act—though it may not have been committed by the prisoner with the intent necessary to constitute the particular at which the questions pointed—may be viewed either as a minor offence or as a tortious act which, though not of a nature to be visited with a penalty, is a legitimate ground for an action for damages on the part of the sufferer. There are no legal means of interpreting the verdict. Hence the difficulty. For the solution of such difficulties the rule has been adopted, not to take the verdict of the jury into account except where it is in terms exclusive of the claim of the private prosecutor and contradictory to it whatever may have been the probable meaning and real intention of the jury. Thus, in the Pierre Bonaparte case, though the verdict of the jury, from the line of defence taken, and the facts of the case, obviously meant that they thought the Prince had acted in self-defence, the Court still granted damages to the family of M. Victor Noir as for a tort.

IN NOTICING (13 S. J. 413) the appointment of Mr. March as H. B. M. Consul at the Fiji Islands, we mentioned that the United States Consul is invested with powers to decide disputes that arise between citizens of the United States. We now learn by the Fiji Times that considerable disappointment was felt when it was found that Mr. March's commission contained no clause investing him with similar powers, and that it is proposed to memorialise the Imperial Government on the subject.

A VERY CURIOUS CASE has recently come before the Civil Court at Lucknow, in India. A Mahomedan husband instituted a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights. The wife pleaded that she had renounced the Mahomedan religion and become a Christian, and that thereby the Mahomedan marriage was cancelled and the husband's rights ceased. The judge decided in favour of the plaintiff. The case, which is exciting great interest in India, will doubtless be appealed, and may not improbably come before the Privy Council. It is noticeable that although the English Probate Court does not recognise a polygamous union (Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee, 14 W. R. 517), the Privy Council, as the Court of Appeal from India, does. Hindu as well as Mahomedan marriages may be polygamous, and it is somewhat curious that a Hindu man cannot be prosecuted for bigamy although a Hindu woman can, and that a Mahomedan can only be prosecuted for bigamy if, having four wives living, he marries a fifth.

THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE BILL.

We last week considered shortly the provisions of the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill now before the House of Lords, and gave our reasons for hoping that the progress of that bill might not be delayed to await the passing of the more complicated and extensive Act with which it is so nearly connected. We showed that the need of some improvement in our appellate tribunals is urgent, and that the remedy provided by the bill in question is apt and simple, while the objects, if any, of delay are comparatively insignificant.

The case is, however, far otherwise when we come to examine the bill named at the head of this article. In this case we find the necessity for legislation (except in one particular) rather sentimental than substantial, while the desirability of caution and circumspection is obvious and unquestioned. It is indeed very desirable, in a sentimental point of view, that the present apparently heterogeneous congeries of independent courts should give way to a single authority, and that the present infinitely perplexing variety of practice should be, so far as it is consistent with utility and convenience, systematised and "unified."

But the need is not, except in the particular about to be mentioned, by any means pressing; the courts as at present constituted are practically sufficient for the purposes of justice, and the extra inconvenience to the practitioners involved in their mutual independence is an evil small in comparison with the possible results of a hasty or ill-considered alteration of their position. The only practical evil, as it seems to us, of any appreciable magnitude,—that which was, indeed, the moving cause of all the stir which has culminated in these bills—is the possibility, of only too frequent occurrence in practice, of a failure of justice arising from the mere fact that a plaintiff has, perhaps in a doubtful case, selected the wrong court for his proceedings.

For instance: A person named as trustee in a settlement is in possession of the settled property by permission of the tenant for life, to whom he pays over a considerable portion of the rents, and he expends the rest, with the consent of the tenant for life, in repairs of the property. Upon his death it is discovered that his expenditure for this purpose has considerably exceeded his receipts. The legal estate in the property being, under the limitations in the settlement, in the tenant for life, what is the remedy of the executors of the deceased trustee? If they bring an action they will probably be told that, as their testator was trustee of the property and in possession in that capacity, they have no contract express or implied by the tenant for life to repay his outlay, and that their remedy (if any) is in equity against the estate; if they file a bill they are equally likely to be told that this is a mere case of agency, and that an agent has no right of suit in equity, in an ordinary case, against his principal; and so they are not unlikely, whatever course they may adopt, to lose their money with costs. Again, we have known a case where the whole benefit of a suit was lost by a circumstance which the plaintiff did not know, and could not have known, at the time he filed his bill; nay, which the defendant himself did not know for certain when he put in his answer. The suit was to prevent the negotiation of a bill of exchange and to procure its delivery up to the plaintiff. The merits were, as the judge stated, entirely in the plaintiff's favour; but it appeared that some days before the bill was filed the defendant had handed the bill of exchange in question to a friend for discount. This would not of itself have stopped the suit, but upon comparison of the dates it came out that the very day before the bill was filed this friend had procured the discount of the bill of exchange by a bonâ fide holder, and that the money had been paid over to the defendant shortly after the institution of the suit. On these facts the Court felt constrained to hold that the plaintiff's only remedy was at law, and to dismiss the bill with costs.

Many attempts to remove or palliate this evil have from time to time been made, but in vain; and the absurd cruelty of allowing plaintiffs to bring their suits to hearing or trial only to be informed that the merits are with them in fact, but they must seek their remedy elsewhere, and pay the costs in the meantime, still continues to be practised both at law and in equity. The Judicature Commissioners set before their eyes the necessity of getting rid of this evil, and they propose to do so by abolishing all distinction of courts, and providing that the different chambers of the High Court shall have ample power of transferring proceedings from any one to any other of them. The bill before us so far follows the report, and proposes to enact that in framing rules of practice the High Court is to have regard to the following direction (amongst others): "That all proceedings shall be instituted in the High Court of Justice and shall be transferable from one divisional or other court to another." So far so good; but, on the one hand, the remedy as proposed does not go far enough, nor is it, on the other hand, necessary to re-model on the whole existing machinery of justice to attain it. It will be nearly, if not quite, as great a hardship to a plaintiff whose cause comes on for hearing in the divisional Court of Chancery, to learn that the only order that can be made is that the cause be transferred to the divisional Court of Common Pleas, and that he pay the costs so far as they have been increased by its not having been prosecuted there from the first, as it would be to have his bill, under the present system, dismissed with costs, with liberty to bring an action. Unless the transfer, if any, is to be limited to some early stage, and the defendant who allows a cause to go to trial or come on for hearing without applying for a transfer is to be held bound by the plaintiff's selection of court or division, nothing will have been gained; and this limitation, which would get rid of all real inconvenience, might easily be gained even if the courts were to continue as separate as at present.

Suppose a short act passed to the effect that any defendant to a suit in Chancery who did not avail himself of the defence that the remedy was at law by demurrer or plea, should be precluded from setting it up, and that the Court should thereupon be bound to determine every legal and equitable question between the parties, and give such relief as the plaintiff would be entitled to in any court of law or equity; and further, that no defendant in any action at law should be able to avail himself of any purely legal defence if the plaintiff had a good equitable right to relief, on terms or otherwise, unless he had taken the objection in the first instance by demurrer to the declaration, or plea to the jurisdiction; and, lastly, that in case of any such objection as aforesaid being taken successfully, the plaintiff should be at liberty to have the proceedings transferred to a court of competent jurisdiction, in such form and on such terms as the court from which they were transferred should direct. This would fully answer all the ends of justice without any amalgamation or assimilation of courts, and less than this will be utterly futile and insufficient, notwithstanding all the proposed change of system. For the real hardship in the case is the incidence of costs, which fall, by reason of the mistake of procedure, on the party who is in the right on the merits; and yet this must be so, for it would be equally wrong to allow the plaintiff, by his own blunder, to increase the costs payable by his adversary. But, unless the power of transfer be limited to some early stage of the proceedings, one or other of these evils must ensue, because some one will have to bear the costs which will have been thrown away. Under the present bill the Court may—and, if not interfered with from without, not improbably will—make such rules in the matter of transfers as will still leave it open to a Vice-Chancellor at the hearing to refuse to adjudicate on a legal claim, though the objection be then taken for the first time, or—of which we have known instances—by the Court itself only; or will allow a judge at Nisi Prius to nonsuit a plaintiff with a good case on account of an outstanding legal estate in term trustees.

As, however, it would seem that we are not to have the little simple remedy we so much need, without waiting for the accomplishment of the grander scheme of which it is so unnecessarily made a subordinate part, it will be well to see how the Act can be framed so as to be passed with as little delay as is reasonably practicable.

On the general scheme of the Act we have but little to add to our former remarks. We think it questionable whether it is advisable to retain the names of the existing courts as divisional names, instead of simply numbering the divisional courts, as 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th divisions respectively, as is done with the divisions of the Court of Session in Scotland; and at any rate we are clear that so cumbersome and uncouth an appellation as "The Divisional Court of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty" ought not to be suffered to remain, but either some one of these names selected as the sole name of the Court, or some other term, ex. gr., "The Court of Civil Law" invented arbitrarily for the occasion. The name need not be in any respect descriptive, all that is required is that it should be distinctive. Again, we can see no reason why the jurisdiction of the London Court of Bankruptcy is not transferred to the High Court, and vested in the Chancery division generally, instead of being attached in addition to his other duties to a single judge thereof, who will thus be at a disadvantage as compared to his fellows in all matters pertaining to their common jurisdiction.

The 14th section of the Act seems to us objectionable. The jurisdiction of the Crown in lunacy, &c., ought, we think, to be vested, not in judge or judges from time to time selected pro hac vice, but in some definite court, divisional or otherwise; and we cannot but think that it forms a branch of original jurisdiction which might properly and conveniently be vested in one of the divisions of the High Court of Appeal.

But it is when we come to consider the clauses giving power to make rules that the objections to the bill in its present form become most apparent; doubtless it is very advisable not to legislate too minutely, and the judges must now be better able than the Houses of Parliament can possibly be to determine the details of procedure; but this bill, as drawn, determines absolutely nothing but the maximum number of the judges, and leaves everything else to rules and orders to be made and from time to time revoked or altered by the judges themselves. We think that such questions as the limits of the jurisdiction of the divisional courts and of single judges, the limitation of the power of re-hearing by the High Court and divisional courts, the number of judges required to concur in a judgment of the High Court or divisional court, &c., ought to be determined, at least in outline, by Parliament itself, and not left to the determination of the Court after its establishment. We do not venture, here and now, to say what such rules ought to be, though we think that the existing practice of the courts of common law points out the principle which ought to be applied to all—viz., that no contested matter not purely interlocutory, other than a mere issue of fact, and that only when tried by a jury, should, except by consent, be heard by a single judge. We would add that not more than one re-hearing of any matter heard by a single judge should be allowed, and that no appeal (as distinguished from a re-hearing) should lie except from an order of a divisional court, or of the High Court itself.

The temporary provisions of the Act do not seem to require much comment. We think it would be better to abolish at once all the existing distinctions of title among judges of equal rank, and instead of Vice-Chancellor, Justice, Baron, Judge of the Admiralty Court, &c., call every such judge Mr. Justice So-and-so; and similarly to abolish at once the terms Chief Justice of Common Pleas, Chief Baron, and Judge Ordinary, and call the judges in question Lord President Bovill, &c. The ends of the several terms would seem to call for legislative interference as much as their commencements. We trust that proper provision will be made, by statute or otherwise, to prevent the proposed reduction in the number of terms having the indirect effect of increasing the time of probation, either for admission as solicitors, or for calls to the bar, in both of which cases the time now to a certain extent depends upon terms. We do not know how far the governing bodies in these cases have power to make the necessary alterations for themselves independently of statute; probably this may be so, but if not, it should be given them by this Act.

The proposed abolition of the Home Circuit has produced so much opposition in the five counties proposed to be affected, that it is, we hear, to be abandoned or materially modified; and under these circumstances we do not think it necessary to comment further upon it at present.

THE REGISTRATION APPEALS.

We noticed in November last (ante pp. 49, 69, and 70) the registration appeals decided by the Court of Common Pleas in Michaelmas Term. Since then the Court has decided the remaining six cases, having heard them all in Hilary Term, and given judgment since term in two cases which they had reserved for further consideration.

The first case, Gainsford v. Brown, added nothing to the law, the point being whether a Dissenting minister was entitled to vote in respect of his occupation of a house provided for him by the Wesleyan Methodist Conference. The law applicable to the case had been clearly laid down in Hughes v. Overseers of Chatham (5 M. & G. 54) and Dobson v. Jones (5 M. & G. 112), to the effect that if the claimant was merely allowed to occupy the house as part of the remuneration for his services, he must be considered to "occupy as tenant," and so would be entitled to vote; but that if he was required to live there for the performance of his duties he would occupy as servant rather than as tenant, and would not be entitled. This was of course a question of fact, which the revising barrister seemed incapable of finding intelligibly either one way or the other. The Court sent back the case to him once, but when re-stated it was little clearer than before. After this the judges stated the law applicable to the case, and then it was struck out of the list by consent. The case may probably not be reported, and it is to be hoped it will not, as it will only increase the confusion which exists at present from there being already three cases reported in the name of Gainsford. This arises from the practice of some revising barristers (one quite unauthorised by the statute) of allowing the agents to appeal in their own names. The next case on the list, Wallis v. Birks, added nothing to the law of general application, being merely a decision that certain land was under a deed and an Act of Parliament sufficiently attached to a perpetual curacy to enable the incumbent to vote. The point also, such as it was, was almost too clear for argument, and in this case the revising barrister's decision was affirmed. In the next case, Allen v. The Town Clerk of Warrington (16 W. R. 316), the Court again showed the disposition which has been so decided of late years, to hold good all proceedings under the Registration Acts, to which the objection is really of a formal character. An objector, in signing his name to a notice of objection, had described himself as on the list of voters for Golburne-street, in the borough of Warrington. It has been held repeatedly that the objector must show on which list his name appears, so that the person objected to may go to the particular list, without having to search them all, and satisfy himself that the person objecting to him is qualified to do so. Now, in Warrington there were three townships, for each of which there was a separate list, and therefore on the part of the voters objected to it was contended that the objector should have specified the township on the list of which his name appeared. The Court, however, held that if it was well known and understood in the borough that Golburne-street was in one particular township the objector had, by saying that he was on the list for Golburne-street, sufficiently described the township on the list for which his name might be found. This certainly is sensible, but it goes beyond anything the Court has held before, and will probably somewhat astonish old-fashioned election agents and revising barristers. The next case on the list, Piercy v. Maclean, was perhaps of more general application than any other heard this year. We have already referred to it by anticipation (ante page 69), and the Court has held in accordance with our view that in the case of a "counting-house" there is no necessity for structural severance in order to give a vote. This point always appeared to us sufficiently obvious: still we think that if it had been decided before Cuthbertson v. Butterworth last year, and the latter case had been properly argued, the result of the latter case might very probably have been different. It may now be taken that in the case of all the qualifying buildings specially mentioned in the Act of 1832 other than house—that is to say, warehouse, counting-house, and shop—there is no necessity that they should be separate buildings, but they may be part of a larger one. As it stands at present it might seem that Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, the case of the under-tenants in the Temple, was a decision that the further words "other building" meant other building ejusdem generis with house, but not ejusdem generis with the three following buildings specified. This certainly would be a curious decision, but we think that the Court did not mean anything of the kind, their attention not having been called to the point, and that they would not hold the case of Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, if it came before them again, as anything but a decision upon the qualification "house." Piercy v. Maclean involved a further point as to whether the rating was sufficient, the counting-house not having been separately rated, but the names of the claimants and of the landlord being bracketed together, and the rateable value of the whole house being set against their names. It was held that this was sufficient as a joint rating. But for the former case of Wright v. Town Clerk of Stockport (5 M. & G. 33), which is nearly identical and to the same effect, this would have been an important decision.

The two remaining cases, Bramfit v. The Overseers of Liverpool and Greenway v. Hocking, related to rights to vote for pews in chapels under special Acts of Parliament. In Hinde v. Chorlton (L. R. 2 C. P. 104) it was decided, after an elaborate argument upon the terms of an Act which appeared at first sight to confer a freehold interest in land on the occupiers of pews, that it did not do so, but only gave a right in the nature of an easement. In the cases of the present year the revising barristers had considered that the words of the Acts before them differed essentially from those in Hinde v. Chorlton, and allowed the votes. The Court, however, has held that no vote was given in either case. In one of the cases—that from Liverpool—the words certainly were very strong, and we think it may now be taken as a general proposition that there cannot under any circumstances be a vote for a pew.

On the whole it can scarcely be said that the registration cases of 1869-70 clear up many doubtful points in the law, although there are certainly several cases likely to be referred to as authorities in special and peculiar cases. It is unfortunate that the case of Swarbrick v. Beswick, which stood over for judgment from the previous year, has dropped without any judgment being pronounced. It was the case which raised the question of the deduction to be made from the annual value of premises in respect of instalments payable to a building society and charged upon the premises. The former cases upon this point (referred to 17 Sol. Jour. 140) are very contradictory, and we had hoped that in Swarbrick v. Beswick the Court would have laid down a rule which might have been generally acted on. The judges, however, appear to have been divided in opinion, and although the case had been once fully argued by Mr. Mellish and Mr. Manisty, they, after taking six months to consider their judgment, directed a second argument. By that time a new register had been formed, so that the decision of the case could have no practical effect, and could only be useful in settling the moot point of law. The parties do not appear to have been public-spirited enough to incur the expense of a second argument for so small a result to themselves, although we cannot help thinking that on applying to the various registration societies which must have to deal with the point in almost every county in England, they might readily have obtained subscriptions for the purpose. Eventually the case was struck out and no decision given, and although one of the parties afterwards wished the case restored and heard, the Court declined to do so. The point, therefore, remains still open for discussion in the registration courts.

Notwithstanding the small result of these appeals we fancy that the majority of the points upon which there was so much difference of opinion in 1868 may now be considered to be settled, though not by authority, by the discussion upon them having brought about a substantial agreement amongst revising barristers and agents. Upon points of practice, however, there will, as long as the present system continues, certainly be difference. We observe that the Government do not propose to legislate this session upon the report of the committee which sat last year and investigated the subject of registration of voters in boroughs. There is, however, to be a committee this session on registration in counties. This is certainly satisfactory, as the system is much more faulty in counties than in boroughs, though for political reasons the latter obtain more attention. We see no reason why a bill should not be passed next session putting the whole system on a satisfactory footing both in boroughs and counties, and without going the length of making such extensive changes as were recommended, at Mr. Vernon Harcourt's instance, by his committee last year.

RECENT DECISIONS.

EQUITY.

RAILWAY COMPANY—SCHEME OF ARRANGEMENT— 30 & 31 VICT. c. 127.

Re Potteries, Shrewsbury, and North Wales Railway Company, L.J.G., 18 W. R. 155.

The Railway Companies Act, 1867, was intended to assist railway companies in debt and unable to meet their engagements, to provide funds for their liabilities, by means either of new capital or of loans. Previously to this Act a company which had exhausted its powers could only have obtained fresh powers by a special Act for that purpose.* The Act empowers the company to prepare a scheme of arrangement which, very much like an arrangement in bankruptcy, is binding on creditors where agreed to by a certain majority. The scheme is first filed in the Court of Chancery, and if it is assented to by the requisite majority of those persons interested, whose consent is necessary under the Act, the Court of Chancery can enrol it, after which it becomes binding as well on the dissenting minority as on the assenting majority. Sections 10—15 describe various classes of persons interested, of which a majority may bind the minority by assenting to a scheme. These classes are (1) holders of mortgages or bonds issued under the company's special Act; (2) holders of rent-charges and other payments charged on the receipts of the company in consideration of the purchase of another company's lines; (3) guaranteed or preference shareholders; (4) ordinary shareholders; (5) debenture-holders and shareholders in any company whose line is leased to the arranging company. Three-fourths in value of each of these classes can bind the minority, but unpaid landowners and general creditors are not mentioned in these sections: their consent is not necessary to the scheme, and they are not bound by it when completed (Re Cambrian Railways Company, 16 W. R. 353, L. R. 3 Ch. 295, in which decision the whole Act is carefully explained). Sections 7 to 9 are intended to ensure a little peace and quietness during the maturing of the scheme: under section 7 the Court may restrain any action against the company upon such terms as it thinks fit; and by section 9, after the announcement of the filing of the scheme in the Gazette, no execution or other process is to be available against the company except under special leave of the Court.

It was decided by Lord Cairns, in the Cambrian Railways case, that these provisions apply to the landowners and general creditors who cannot be bound by the scheme (except, of course, by their special individual assents). [Vice-Chancellor Wood had thought that section 23 of the Act excepted the landowners and general creditors from the operation of sections 7—9, upon which point his Honour's decision was overruled by Lord Cairns.] Lord Justice Giffard has decided in the present case that the provisions of sections 7—9 are merely interim provisions, and extend only to the interval between the filing and enrolment of the scheme. After enrolment persons within the five classes above-mentioned will of course be bound by the scheme. Any injunction against transgression of its provisions must then be obtained by bill filed. It is also decided in the present case that a debenture-holder who has obtained a judgment for the amount of his debt does not thereby cease to be a debenture-holder; he is therefore still a party who may be bound by a scheme.

It appears from the decision of Lord Cairns in the Cambrian case that the Court will only confirm a scheme, or restrain process against the company, if it considers the scheme a reasonable arrangement which has a probability of success. In Re Somerset and Dorset Railway Company (18 W. R. 332) Vice-Chancellor Stuart allowed "outside creditors"—i.e., landowners and general creditors—to be heard in opposition to a scheme.

It may also be noted that whereas in Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company (15 W. R. 482, L. R. 3 Eq. 541) Vice-Chancellor Wood held that a debenture-holder who issues execution can only do so as a trustee on behalf of himself and the other judgment creditors, this decision is now questioned by Lord Justice Giffard in the present case.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—SUB-PURCHASER.

Fenwick v. Bulman, V.C.S., 18 W. R. 179, L. R. 9 Eq. 165.

NOTICE—SUB-PURCHASER.

McCright v. Foster, M.R., 18 W. R. 509.

It may be regarded as a definite principle that a mere sub-purchaser is not a proper party to a specific performance bill filed by the original vendor, and cannot himself file a bill against the vendor, there being no privity between them (see Cutts v. Thodey, 1 Coll. C. C. 233, and Chadwick v. Muden, 9 Ha. 188). The rule, that by a contract of purchase the purchaser becomes in equity the owner, applies only as between the parties to the contract, and not to strangers to it (Tasker v. Small, 3 My. & Cr. 63). But if the vendor has recognised the sub-purchaser, the case is taken out of the rule. Thus in Holden v. Hayn, 1 Mer. 47, where one who had a contract of purchase assigned his interest under the contract and the vendor recognised the assignee by delivering the abstract of title to him and offering to execute him a conveyance, the vendor afterwards filing a specific performance bill against both the purchaser and his assignee, the bill was dismissed with costs as against the original vendee, and specific performance decreed as against the assignee. In the principal case of Fenwick v. Bulman the vendors had recognised the sub-purchaser by making him a party to their own bill for specific performance, after which the Vice-Chancellor held that they could no longer claim to be considered as strangers to his contract, and, therefore, unnecessary parties to his suit for specific performance.

* The company could (but only, of course, at a heavy discount) raise money by the issue of "Lloyd's Bonds," the holders of which would be entitled to rank as creditors of the company, to the extent to which the moneys so raised could be proveable to have been applied in satisfaction of claims actually recoverable from the company, but no further: Vide the Cork and Youghal Railway Company's case (18 W. R. 26).

The Vice-Chancellor in this case expressed his disapproval of a dictum of Lord Cairns in Aberaman Iron-works Company v. Wickens (17 W. R. 211, L. R. 4 Ch. 111) as ill-founded, as drawing an ill-founded distinction between a suit for specific performance and a suit for rescission. In that case certain persons had, by arrangement between themselves and the vendor, an interest in the benefit of his contract, and Lord Cairns said that they were properly made parties to a suit for rescission, though they could not have been made parties to a specific performance suit. The Vice-Chancellor queries the distinction, quoad hoc, between a specific performance suit and one for rescission, and we agree with him that in general there must be none. In point of fact the circumstances in the case before Lord Cairns were so complicated and so special that it is highly inexpedient to take guidance from the dictum to which they gave rise. The Vice-Chancellor, in conclusion, states that the obvious equity of a sub-purchaser is clearly recognised by Lord Hardwicke in Dyer v. Pulteney (Barnardiston, 160). We take it as settled by the older cases that the equity of the sub-purchaser only arises when he has been recognised by the vendor.

Upon this latter point an important question arises as to the notice and recognition of the sub-purchaser by the original vendor. What amounts to recognition; what duty does notice cast upon the vendor who receives it?

In the second principal case of McCraith v. Foster, a vendor entered into an agreement to sell a beneficial lease attended with onerous covenants. The purchaser deposited his contract with a bank, as a security for an advance, and the bank promptly gave notice to the vendor. After this the purchase-money (or rather a balance of purchase-money then due), being tendered by the purchaser, the vendor, without further communication with the bank, conveyed to him. He conveyed to a purchaser without notice and then became bankrupt, and the Master of the Rolls decreed the vendor to recoup them the amount of their loss. It is clear from Dyer v. Pulteney (supra) that a sub-purchaser can only have a remedy against the original vendor, on the terms of placing himself in the original purchaser's shoes, and undertaking to carry out his contract; and it seems also clear, from Lucas v. Commerford (3 B. O. C. 166), overruling Moore v. Greg (2 Phil. 717), that an equitable assignee of a lease cannot be compelled to take upon himself the responsibility of an assignee out and out at the suit of the lessors. We fail to appreciate the grounds on which the latter cases were distinguished by Lord Romilly. Applying those cases to the present, the vendor could not have compelled the bank to take an assignment from him, and, on the other hand, they could have obtained no right as against him, unless the terms of standing in the original purchaser's shoes. We are informed that this case stands for appeal. We think that it may be affirmed on the ground that by completing without communication to them the vendor gave them no option of electing to stand in the purchaser's shoes. The Master of the Rolls' decision proceeds on this ground, and it is one which involves no practical hardship. It can hardly be considered unfair to say:—"The sub-purchaser has prima facie no right against you unless he will offer to take the place of the original purchaser; but if you, after notice from him, deprive him of the option, you render yourself liable to him."

We think, however, that the Master of the Rolls has stated a rule too widely as to the effect of sub-contracts in general. The point involved in this case is one of much practical importance, and we shall look with interest for the appeal.

LEGAL MEANING OF "BEERHOUSE."

London and North Western Railway Company v. Garrett V.C.J., 18 W. R. 246, L. R. 9 Eq. 26.

A beerhouse, according to the Vice-Chancellor and "Burn's Justice," is a house where beer, &c., is sold by retail to be drunk on the premises, and a similar definition is found in the edition of 1845, which was the current edition at the time when the covenant not to use a house as a beerhouse was entered into, the alleged breach of which was the question in the suit. It was open to the plaintiffs to contend, on the authority of Webster's Dictionary, that a beerhouse is a place where beer is sold, whether to be consumed on the premises or not; but the question was, what was the legal, rather than the popular, meaning of the word; and there can be little doubt that the consumption of beer on the premises, with its attendant nuisances, is the evil against which such covenants are intended to guard. In Pease v. Coates (14 W. R. 1021) it was held that the sale of beer by retail, not to be drunk on the premises, was no breach of a covenant not to use the premises as a public-house for the sale of beer, wine, malt liquors, or spirits. In Fielden v. Slater (17 W. R. 485) Vice-Chancellor James held that the sale of wine and spirits in bottle by a grocer, as an agent of a firm of London wine merchants, was a breach of a covenant "not to use the house as an inn, public-house, or tap-room, or for the sale of spirituous liquors, wine or beer," where the concluding words pointed to a further restriction than that supplied by the words "not to use the house as an inn, public house, or tap-room." But in Jones v. Bone (18 W. R. 489), where the covenant was against exercising the trade or calling of a hotel-keeper, or the trade or calling of a seller by retail, it was held that the sale of wine and spirits in bottles not to be consumed on the premises, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2, was no breach of the covenant, and the bill was dismissed, without prejudice to any question which might be tried at law. The distinction between the covenant not to sell, and the covenant not to exercise the trade of a seller by retail, is important. Upon the whole, it may be regarded as settled that the sale of liquors by retail, not to be drunk on the premises, is no breach of a covenant against using the premises as a beer-house or public-house. The meaning of the latter word, which is quite modern, was dismissed in Pease v. Coates.

COMMON LAW.

EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGE TOO REMOTE.

Smith v. London and South Western Railway Company, C.P., 18 W. R. 343.

In order to entitle a plaintiff to have his case left to the jury in an action of negligence, the plaintiff must, as a general rule, give affirmative evidence of negligence by the defendant. "When the evidence is equally consistent with either negligence or no negligence it is not competent for the judge to leave it to the jury to find either alternative, but it must be taken as amounting to no proof at all" (Cotton v. Wood, 29 L. J. C. P. 333). This rule is not without exception. In the case of an accident which can hardly happen without negligence, the accident itself may amount to prima facie evidence of negligence, as in Byrne v. Boodle (12 W. R. 279), where a barrel of flour fell out of a warehouse in the defendants' occupation and injured the plaintiff. It was held that the occurrence of the accident raised a presumption of negligence against the defendants, and that the case should be left to the jury, although there was no further evidence of negligence. It is doubtful, however, how far this exception is likely to be extended (see Scott v. The London Dock Company, 13 W. R. 410).

In Smith v. The London and South Western Railway Company this rule requiring affirmative evidence of the defendants' negligence has not been fully followed out. The defendants cut grass, &c., on the banks of their line, in August, in very dry weather, and allowed it to remain there in heaps for about a fortnight. These heaps caught fire during a high wind, and the fire extended a long way and burnt the plaintiff's cottage at a considerable distance from the heaps. Immediately before the fire broke out two trains of the defendants' had passed the spot, and at the same time there had been some platelayers and other servants of the defendants' near the spot eating their dinners and smoking. There was no further evidence to show what set the heaps on fire. The case was left to the jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the question before the Court was whether or not the plaintiff ought to have been nonsuited. Bovill, C.J., and Keating, J. (Brett, J., dissenting), held that there was evidence to go to the jury.

It would seem that the evidence in this case was "equally consistent with negligence or no negligence" on the part of the defendants, for the fire might have been caused by persons not connected with the defendants, or by acts of the defendants' servants, for which they would not be responsible, as by sparks from their pipes (Williams v. Jones, 12 W. R. 1007). If this is so the case ought not to have been left to the jury (as the principle of Byrne v. Boodle appears not to apply), if the rule in Cotton v. Woode is to be followed. As, however, it was held that the case was properly left to the jury, it must be considered that there is now some doubt whether this rule will now be strictly observed.

Brett, J., dissented from the view taken by the other learned judges, not upon this ground, but because he thought the damage suffered by the plaintiff was, under the circumstances, too remote, as the immediate cause was the dryness of the weather, coupled with the high wind, rather than the burning of the heaps of grass. Brett, J., gives a somewhat singular reason for holding that the plaintiff's damage was too remote, viz., that the defendants, "as reasonable men, could not have foreseen the further contingency and combination that the fire" would burn the plaintiff's cottage as well as intervening ground. There is no doubt that damage, although caused really by a tortious act, may be so remote as not to be recoverable, but this is on the principle that the tortious act is not the immediate cause of the damage, or in other words, the damage is not the natural consequence of the act. If, however, the damage which has occurred is the natural consequence of the defendant's tortious act, the defendant will be liable, whether or not he could have foreseen the actual damage as a probable result of his act. The principle that a defendant is only liable for damage which he might have foreseen applies to actions upon contracts, but not to actions of tort. This is clear, and it is to be regretted that carelessness of language in a judgment should seem to cast a doubt upon a question, where no doubt should exist.

COURTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORDS JUSTICE GIFFARD.

March 28.—In re Palmer; Ex parte Palmer.

This bankruptcy appeal raised the question whether appeals in bankruptcy proceedings instituted in a county court before the 31st of December last should be made to this court or to the chief judge in bankruptcy.

The Lord Justice held that in such cases the appeals should be made to this court. Under the new Act the chief judge would hear appeals in cases instituted after the 31st of December last.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

LINCOLN'S-INN FIELDS.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

March 28.—Re Tulmanson.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 125, rule 230—Injunction—Costs.

The debtor in this case filed a petition for arrangement on the 19th inst., and on the 21st a receiver was appointed. He had carried on business in London as a grocer, and his stock-in-trade and fixtures were sworn to be of the value of £300. At the period of the petition being filed the debtor had been sued by several creditors, and it appeared that some of them were now in a position to issue execution; the debts amounted to about £2,000.

Brought for the debtor now moved, pursuant to notice, for an injunction restraining further proceedings in the several actions. He stated that it was important in the interest of the general body of the creditors that the property should not be sacrificed by a forced sale.

Mr. Piesse, solicitor for one of the creditors, said that issue had been joined in the action brought by his client, and the cause was now ready for trial. He asked that, in accordance with the ordinary practice at common law, his costs should be paid.

Mr. J. Scott, solicitor for another creditor, also asked that provision should be made for his costs.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that the injunction moved for would be granted, and, with regard to costs, all he could do was to reserve the question for future consideration. It was impossible for him to make an order for payment of twenty shillings in the pound upon the amount of the costs and to leave the other creditors the amount only of their dividend; he did not think he should be asked to make an order for payment of the costs in full.

Solicitors, Reed & Lovell.

Re Rogers.

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 125—Inaccuracy of list of creditors—Practice.

Bagley, for the debtor, who had filed a petition for an arrangement, applied for the direction of the Court upon the refusal of Mr. Keene to register a resolution of creditors come to at a meeting of creditors held on the 24th inst., at Bangor, in Wales.

It seemed that the debtor had carried on business at three different places—one in London and two in Wales—as a slate merchant and slate quarry proprietor. The business of the debtor as a slate quarry proprietor was managed by his son with the assistance of a foreman, and the debtor himself was not personally acquainted with the names of certain of his creditors nor of the amount of their respective debts. When the notices were given calling a meeting of creditors the debtor inadvertently omitted the names of some twenty persons, whose debts amounted altogether to about £150, but it appeared that at the first meeting creditors whose claims represented an aggregate of £3,000 attended either personally or by proxy. An affidavit filed in support of the application explained the circumstances under which the notices were given, and showed that the omission of certain names had arisen through inadvertence, and the application to the Court was either to direct the registrar to receive the resolution of the creditors—which provided for the payment of ten shillings in the pound on the debts due—or to give leave to hold a meeting in substitution for that which had already taken place.

The CHIEF JUDGE was of opinion that an irregularity had occurred, and that it could only be corrected by holding another meeting, for which leave would be given, but notice must be given to the whole of the creditors, whether attending the former meeting or not. His Lordship was willing to believe that the error had occurred inadvertently, but the matter must be set right. If, at the substituted meeting, the resolution was again confirmed, there seemed to be no reason why it should not be registered.

NOTICE.

The Chief Judge will not sit from the 30th March to the 19th April, both days inclusive. During that period all motions, &c., of a pressing nature must be made before the senior registrar in attendance at the court in Basinghall-street.

COUNTY COURTS.

SOUTHWARK.

(Before C. J. WHITMORE, Esq., Q.C.)

March 17.—Carpenter v. The South Eastern Railway Company.

Railway Company—Liability under 11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 68, s. 1, for lost parcel—Party to sue.

Shortt for the plaintiff; Willis for the defendants.

The plaintiff, an attorney practising in the Temple, is agent for Mr. Gibson, of Dartford, and in the month of August last sent by the defendants' company a parcel containing law documents, amongst which were an award and a judgment paper which he (Mr. Carpenter) had been using in the capacity of London agent.

The papers were never delivered to the consignee, and the plaintiff demanded of the company the sum of £9 12s. for copies, and £3 3s. for attendances and expenses incurred in obtaining the same. The company refused to satisfy this demand, as they contended the parcel was over the value of £10, and no additional charge was paid on booking, as directed by the above section of the Act.

Mr. Carpenter subsequently issued a plaint for £9 12s. only, for making copies of the papers.

Three points of law were argued: first, who was the right party to sue, the consignor (Mr. Carpenter) or the consignee (Mr. Gibson); second, what was the meaning of "value" in section 1 of the Act; and, third, what is a "security for money" under the same section.

Willis, for the company.

Shortt, for the plaintiff, cited Freeman v. Birch, 32 L. J. Q. B. 492n., and Sargent v. Morris, 3 B. & A. 281. Secondly, that the sum of £9 12s. which had been paid for the copies was the "value" of the lost documents, and that the charge for attendances, &c. (which were not inserted in the plaint), were professional "costs" of the plaintiff, and could not be estimated as part of the "loss" sustained; the question was, the value when booked, and not the damage that an owner would incur in replacing what was booked. Thirdly, that the words "securities for money" were to be taken ejusdem generis, and the intention of the Legislature could not have been that the section should apply to all agreements or orders for payment, and that even if the award ever had been a "security," as the money in dispute had been paid, the stamped document had lost its pecuniary nature; he, therefore, contended that as the parcel was under the value of £10, the plaintiff had acted in compliance with section 1 of the statute, and was entitled to his claim against the company with costs.

March 23.—Mr. WHITMORE delivered the following judgment.—This was an action for £9 12s., the asserted value of a parcel containing law papers sent by the South Eastern Railway Company and lost. A question as to the right of the plaintiff to sue was raised, as I presume, for a different purpose than that of merely defeating the present action, but I may dispose of it by saying that, as I think the plaintiff was the party contracting with the carrier and having a special property in the goods sent, he was entitled to sue; and there remained the more important question in the case, viz., what was the value of the law papers or "writings" which were lost? The company, seeking to avail themselves of the Carriers Act, contended that their value exceeded £10, and, of course, the duty lay on them of establishing that excess. To do so they adopted as a measure of value the probable cost of the original production of these documents. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contended that the true measure was the cost of replacing them by exact equivalent. As a fact, it was shown that such equivalent had been produced at a cost below £10, and I am of opinion that the criterion proposed by the defendants is a fallacious one, and that proposed by the plaintiff one more reasonable and satisfactory. The articles in question are things of no intrinsic or general value. They are of value more or less to the owner only. They were produced to serve a particular purpose, and, that purpose accomplished, their value would in a great degree cease. This consideration alone would negative the fitness of the measure or test put forward by the defendants. On the other hand, as these papers were of value only to the owner, and copies would be of equal value to him, the cost of such copies better represents what he has lost than the cost of the originals themselves.

Judgment for plaintiff: costs.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Makinson & Carpenter.

Mr. Justice Willes recently, in sentencing two prisoners prosecuted and convicted under section 221 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, expressed his opinion of the inadequacy of punishments under the old Act. Two prisoners were indicted for concealment of several hundreds of pounds' worth of property at the time of their bankruptcy; and a third prisoner was indicted for aiding and abetting. Mr. Justice Willes, in passing sentence, regretted that the offences had been committed while the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 was in force, as it limited his power of sentencing the prisoners to a punishment adequate to their guilt. He could only give them twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour; but were the new Act in force he could have dealt with them more in accordance with their deserts.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. GEORGE PHILIPPO, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Attorney-General for the Colony of British Columbia, in succession to Mr. H. P. P. Crease, promoted to be a Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court. Mr. Philippo was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in January, 1862 (certificate of honour). In 1868 he was appointed to succeed Mr. Huggins as Queen's Advocate at Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa.

Mr. HENRY STEWART CUNNINGHAM, M.A., barrister-at-law, has been appointed, by the Government of India, to officiate as a Judge of the Chief Court of the Punjab, during the absence of Mr. C. Boulnois. Mr. Cunningham was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1856, and gained the prize for the English essay in the following year. He was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1859, and formerly went the Home Circuit. He has been Law Adviser to the Government of the Punjab since 1866.

Mr. FREDERICK J. FEGEN (R.N.), of Lincoln's-inn, barrister-at-law, has been appointed Naval Counsel to H. R. H. the Duke of Edinburgh.

Mr. JOHN BURDER, solicitor, of Manchester, has been appointed Legal Secretary to the Right Rev. James Fraser, the newly-consecrated Bishop of Manchester. Mr. Burder took out his certificate, as an attorney and notary, in Trinity Term, 1841; he was for some years secretary to the late Bishop Lee, and fills the office of registrar of the diocese.

Mr. WILLIAM CHATER, solicitor, of Lowestoft, has been appointed, by the Board of Inland Revenue, Distributor of Stamps for the Lowestoft District, in the room of Mr. R. Morris, deceased. Mr. Chater, who was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term, 1851, is also Registrar of the County Courts for the Lowestoft District.

Mr. CHARLES NEWMAN, of Barnsley, York, has been appointed a Perpetual Commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, in and for the West Riding of the county of York.

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE REVESTMENT OF MORTGAGES BILL.

Sir,—As Mr. Dodd's Bill for Facilitating the Re-vesting of Mortgaged Estates seems to be passing through the House of Commons without being opposed or even discussed, perhaps you will allow me to point out shortly some of the principal defects in and objections to the measure. It is proposed to enact that if any person competent to give a discharge for the moneys for the time being due on any mortgage or other security shall by some writing acknowledge or declare that the same have been paid or satisfied, then and thereupon the hereditaments comprised in such mortgage or other security shall be held for the same estates and interests and in the same manner and right in all respects as the same would have been held had such mortgage or other security never been made.

1. It is not unusual for the legal estate in a mortgaged property to have been conveyed to the mortgagee by some previous mortgagee who is paid off, or by some previous owner from whom the mortgagor had purchased it. In all cases of this kind the effect of an acknowledgment by the mortgagee that the debt was satisfied would be to re-vest the property in the previous mortgagee or owner, and not in the person entitled to the equity of redemption. This would be rather inconvenient.

2. Suppose that a mortgagee has, under a power of sale, conveyed part of the mortgaged property to a purchaser and afterwards acknowledges that the whole debt is satisfied, the property conveyed to the purchaser will re-vest in the mortgagor or other the person who would have been entitled if the mortgage had never been made. This is a startling result, but it seems to be a necessary deduction from the language of the bill. The re-vesting takes effect upon all the hereditaments comprised in the mortgage, i.e., all those described in and conveyed by that deed, and is not limited to the hereditaments remaining vested in the mortgagee: and the principle that no man can derogate from his own grant cannot be extended to prevent a mortgagee from making a statement perfectly true and innocent in itself, merely because it will have the indirect effect of defeating a conveyance he has made. The bill, if passed in its present shape, will make it impossible for a mortgagee to convey a safe title to a purchaser under his power of sale, except with the concurrence of the mortgagor and his subsequent incumbrancers.

3. On a subsequent investigation of the title it would be impossible to ascertain whether the person who had acknowledged that the mortgage debt was satisfied was competent to give a discharge for it. If a mortgage debt is on the face of the mortgage deed payable to A., but, in fact, A. is a trustee for B., and B. gives the mortgagor notice not to pay the debt except to himself, A. would not be competent to give a discharge to the mortgagor for the mortgage debt, and therefore an acknowledgment signed by him would not as it seems to me, have the effect of revesting the mortgaged hereditaments, and the legal estate would remain outstanding in the mortgagee. According to the present law a subsequent purchaser has only to see whether on the face of the title-deeds the mortgage debt appears to have been paid to the proper person. The possession of the legal estate, of which the perusal of the title-deeds can make him almost absolutely certain, will protect him from any equitable claims of which he has no notice. Mr. Dodds' bill will make his possession of the legal estate itself dependent upon whether the person apparently competent to give a discharge for the mortgage debt really was so, a matter which it is impossible for a subsequent purchaser to ascertain.

Some of the serious defects I have pointed out could probably be remedied without giving up the principle of the bill, but whatever improvements may be introduced, it seems to me that such a bill must necessarily greatly increase the risk of concealed incumbrances. At present a purchaser taking a conveyance from a first mortgagee in possession of the title-deeds and the mortgagor, without notice of any other incumbrances, may feel morally certain that he has the legal estate and cannot be attacked by subsequent incumbrancers. But if the proposed bill should become law, a purchaser taking a conveyance from the mortgagor, and obtaining from the mortgagee an acknowledgment that his debt is satisfied, will have no security except the mortgagor's honesty against the existence of a concealed second mortgagee. Such a second mortgagee would not be entitled to the title-deeds, but on the first mortgage being satisfied he would get the legal estate. Under the present law the possession of the title-deeds usually shows where the legal estate is, but under the new law it will be impossible to ascertain this.

VENDOR AND SUB-PURCHASER.

Sir,—The case of McCreight v. Foster reported in the last number of the Weekly Reporter opens some questions very important to conveyancing practitioners. Suppose a vendor contract to sell land in fee-simple for a deposit down, the rest of the purchase-money to be paid for in one or more instalments, with powers of re-sale in default, &c. And suppose that the purchaser contracts to sell or let the land in say 100 or 1,000 lots for building, to be paid for, say when houses finished or otherwise, and that the 100 or 1,000 sub-contractees give vendor notice of their contracts—what rights against vendor do they gain? Can they all insist on notice from vendor to them before he completes the purchase with his purchaser? And how far can they, if they receive such notice, stand in the way of the completion of the original contract? If so, must these notices be served by hand or merely posted?

Or to gain any right must not the sub-contractees attend, and tender vendor the money, and perhaps a conveyance at the time fixed in vendor's contract; or, at any rate, offer to put himself in purchaser's shoes (Dyer v. Pulleney, Barnardiston, 160).

Further, suppose the property sold were a leasehold burthened with covenants. It might be that vendor was willing to sell and convey to his contractee because he could rely on the sufficiency of the latter's covenant to indemnify against rent and covenants, but that he would by no means accept the sub-contractee's covenants. What, in this case, are the sub-contractee's rights against him?

There might also be questions as to covenants running with the land. The case of Fenwick v. Bulman (18 W. R.

179, L. R. 9 Eq. 165) seems to show that a sub-purchaser can have no rights against original vendor unless the vendor has recognised him—follows in fact Dyer v. Pulleney.

If McCreight v. Foster is rightly decided, a new condition of sale may be wanted to defend vendor against purchaser cutting himself into equitable payments. At common law of course, no transfer of contract (in its entirety even) for purchase would be noticed.

Again, take the common case of a contract to grant a lease to a builder, and a deposit of that contract with his creditors, or a dozen liens given on it, and notice of them given to lessor. How far can lessor, without his own consent, be encumbered as to the fulfilment of these dealings? It is not unusual in such a case to obtain from lessor a promise to the creditor to give him notice of completion of contract before the creditor will advance the money. But is this promise unnecessary?

The case we refer to seems also to raise another point, bearing more on the relief given in equity. Assuming the sub-contractor to be entitled, as in McCreight v. Foster, to relief equivalent to damages from vendor for having conveyed to his own contractee without notice to sub-contractee, is not vendor entitled to relief over against his original contractee, and should not the decree be against the contractee in the first instance, with remedy only against vendor if he is in default? I understand that the case referred to stands on appeal.

COUNTY VOTING.

Sir,—The owner of a long leasehold house in Middlesex of the nett value of, at least, £60 per annum, desires to be rated for the relief of the poor in respect of it, but at the same time to obtain, by means of this property, votes for the county for two sons.

Can any of your readers inform me how the desired object can be effected. The lodger clause seems inapplicable.

PARLIAMENT AND LEGISLATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

March 28.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill was read a first time.

March 29.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill.—Lord Dufferin moved the second reading. He expressed deep shame and sorrow at the necessity; but while convinced that powers were needed, he believed that the bulk of the Irish people, being genuinely loyal, the powers in question, though carefully guarded, would be sufficient to restore order.—The Duke of Richmond pointed to the charges of the Irish judges as a justification of the measure: he approved its provisions, especially the press clauses, regretted earlier action had not been taken, and hoped the measure would be vigorously enforced.—Lord Oranmore attributed the present state of Ireland in a great measure to the speeches made by members of the present administration, and lamented the Irish policy of the Government at some length.—Lord Lurgan was sure of the necessity for the bill, and hoped that cessation of the illegal acts it was aimed at would soon make it a dead letter.—Lord Derby said that, though the action came somewhat tardily, it was not one whit too strong, the press clauses particularly. He thought unanimity should no longer be required of Irish juries.—Lord Kimberley justified the delay by the superior importance of the Land Bill, the statistics of the crimes in question, and the unanimity with which the bill had now been received. He approved of the proposal as to juries, but it was unfit for a merely temporary measure.—Lord Salisbury said the chief defect of the bill was that it struck only at the Fenians, and not at the Ribbonmen, who were driving capital from Ireland. Abolish the necessity for jury unanimity, and the secret assassin would be robbed of his security. No remedial measures would suffice by themselves. Ireland was now worse than ever after 100 years of such. The fact was that the population of many districts, being low in the scale of civilisation, must be made to fear the law before they would love it.—Earl Granville would like to hear the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Salisbury argue out the jury question together. He doubted whether the suggestion could be applied to Ireland, and not at the same time to England. The bill aimed at agrarian outrage as much as Fenianism. It was not the fact that the Government were just awakening from a delusive belief in remedial measures. Remedial legislation would do its work in the long run.

The bill was then read a second time.

The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill—Committee.—Earl Clanricarde was surprised at the number of Government amendments announced; he disapproved the turning the Irish police into a quasi-military force ill adapted for detecting a crime.—Lord Dufferin said the Irish police had shown much skill. They were to be aided by a good detective force if possible.—Lord Dufferin added another clause empowering the Lord Lieutenant to revoke licences to carry arms in proclaimed districts.—The press clauses were amended in order to render newspapers printed out of Ireland seizable there if containing seditious matter.—Some other slight amendments having been made, the report was received, and the bill read the third time and passed.

Attorneys and Solicitors (Ireland). The Lord Chancellor had a request to make to Lord Chelmsford, who had given notice of his intention to move an address that evening for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the statements contained in a petition from certain solicitors and attorneys in Ireland, in regard to fees levied from them by the Hon. Society of King's Inn, Dublin. It appeared to him that some of the statements of the petition, if they could be substantiated, would demand inquiry. At the same time, he had felt it his duty to communicate with persons who had more information than he could possess on the subject,—namely, those connected with the profession in Ireland; and he found that it was desirable and also that it was desired on the part of certain of the benchers in Ireland, and especially by the law officers, and, he believed, also by some of the judges, that some opportunity should be given them to look into the matter. He, therefore, hoped his noble and learned friend would not proceed with his motion until a reasonable time was allowed for seeing whether there was any answer to be made to the prima facie case set forth in the petition.

Lord Chelmsford had no other wish than that the House should come fully prepared to deal with the question he had to bring forward, and he at once yielded to the request made to him to defer it for the present.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

March 25.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill (Committee).—Clause 27 (Press). The House resumed the consideration of Mr. Bouverie's amendment to omit the description "seditious" from the definition of publications which were to be declared forfeited to the Crown. After a long debate the amendment was negatived by a majority of 333 to 56. The clause was finally carried by a majority of 255 to 29. In clause 30 the time for bringing an action for an excessive and improper seizure was extended from fourteen days to two months. Clause 31 was omitted. With these exceptions clauses 28—36 were agreed to with verbal amendments. Clause 37 (Grand juries empowered to present compensation for damage done by outrages) was passed provisionally only, to be amended upon the report. Clause 38 (Assessment of the damages on occupiers). An amendment to charge it similarly to the county cess was rejected by a majority of 43 to 34.—Mr. Maguire proposed a clause requiring three notices to be given to newspaper proprietors before seizure under the press clauses.—The Solicitor-General agreed to one notice, but Mr. Maguire pressing his clause to a division, it was thrown out by a majority of 105 to 18.

March 26.—The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill (Report of Amendments).—The Solicitor-General for Ireland substituted for clause 27 a clause providing that a warning should be given to newspaper proprietors before seizure, to be given between 8 a.m. and 6 p.m., with the same security for personal service as in ejectment cases. The Solicitor-General for Ireland also added to clause 29 of the bill a clause providing that chattels seized should be detained till the determination of an action by the proprietor, to be restored on a verdict in his favour; and such restoration to be considered by the jury towards mitigation of damages. A proviso was added by the Solicitor-General for Ireland, on the suggestion of Mr. Bouverie, providing that no copy of a newspaper printed before the Act should be receivable in evidence in favour of a seizure. Clause 38 was, after all, amended so as to render the compensation for damages leviable in the same manner as the grand jury cess, instead of on the dwelling-houses.—The standing orders having been suspended, the bill was read a third time and passed.

The Churchwardens Eligibility Bill was read a third time and passed.

March 28.—The Irish Land Bill (Committee).—Clause 1 (Ulster custom). An amendment by Mr. Headlam intended to facilitate the extinction of the custom by arrangement and providing for the filing of a memorandum of such extinction in the Landed Estates Court, was negatived without division.—An amendment by Mr. Samuelson proposing to legalise all other agricultural customs, besides the Ulster tenant-right custom, was rejected by a majority of 325 to 42.—The debate then proceeded upon the question of defining the Ulster custom. On the suggestion of Mr. Cross "usages" was substituted for "usage."—A definition proposed by Mr. Johnston, defining tenant-right as a right of continued occupation on the payment of the rent stipulated or determined by fair valuation, or as the right of the tenant to sell his interest to a solvent incoming tenant to whom a landlord shall not make a reasonable objection, was objected to by Mr. Chichester Fortescue as not so much a definition as the creation of new customs, and implying a Government valuation of rent. The amendment was rejected by 318 to 39. On Mr. Fortescue's motion the words were omitted from the clause which limit the custom to compensation to be made or allowed on account of the outgoing tenant of a holding, and several other verbal amendments were made. The first paragraph of the first clause having been completed, progress was reported.

March 29.—Monastic and Conventual Institutions.—Mr. Newdegate moved for a select committee to inquire into the existence, character, and increase of conventual and monastic institutions or societies in Great Britain, and into the terms upon which income, property, and estates belonging to such institutions or societies, or to members thereof, are received, held, or possessed. After some debate the motion was carried by a majority of 131 to 129.

County Court Buildings.—A bill by Mr. Ayrton to place these buildings under the control of the Commissioners of Public Works, transferring also to them the property of the courts, was read a first time.

March 30.—The Felons' Property Bill.—Mr. C. Forster moved the second reading. He said its principle had received the approval, among others, of Chief Justice White-side, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and Vice-Chancellor Malins. The species of civil death inflicted in England on all felons was peculiar to this country. In other countries the convict was allowed to dispose of his property, even in those cases in which a capital sentence had been carried into execution. Why, because the offender was punished, should the innocent be compelled to suffer. There were many misdemeanours for which the sentences passed were heavier than for the majority of felonies, and yet no inconvenience arose from leaving persons convicted of the former class of offence the control of their property. When prisoners sentenced for some trifling larceny were obliged to hand over any money they might have about them to the Crown, instead of leaving it for the support of their wives and families, a feeling of sympathy instead of reprobation was excited in their favour. It was indeed contended that the Crown, upon proper representations being made to it, was ready to forgo its rights in such cases; but even if that were literally the fact, it furnished no good reason why a law which was a blot on our jurisprudence should be allowed to continue. Of £1,200 forfeited to the Crown in 1864 £490 had been returned, while out of a sum of £1,589 forfeited in 1868 £1,112 had been returned; and was it desirable for so small an amount that a right which operated very offensively should be maintained?—Mr. O. Morgan supported the measure on the ground that the existing law was totally unsuited to the requirements of the present day. No doubt the bill touched upon a question of great magnitude; but on the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread, he would accept it with pleasure rather than wait for a comprehensive measure.—Mr. Jessel heartily supported the bill. Practically the law was not always enforced, and when enforced it came in the nature of a fine, not regulated by the enormity of the offence, but by the amount of property the convict happened to possess. Remarking upon the old law under which the King took the felon's lands for a year and a day on the plea of corruption of blood, which disabled a man's heirs from succeeding him, he remarked that this corruption of blood had been limited by an Act of George IV. to cases of treason and murder, and it was now quite time it was altogether done away with. He also suggested the adoption of the practice in vogue in some foreign countries, of giving compensation to persons robbed, out of the effects of the thief, if he had any, instead of limiting the restoration to the actual stolen property or the proceeds from it; and, besides this, he recommended that compensation should be given to a person on account of personal injuries received at the hands of the felon, the jury fixing the amount, and leaving it to the prosecutor to levy the amount on the felon's goods. But provisions should be inserted in the bill forfeiting a Government pension in the case of felony, and rights of citizenship also, so that no convict could be returned to sit in Parliament. For the better consideration of these points he recommended that the bill be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Bruce approved the bill, and promised that the Government would facilitate its progress. He joined in the proposal to refer it to a select committee, and thought the suggestions as regarded compensation contained in the Government Bill of 1865 would form a good basis of operations on that head. It was questionable whether provisions preventing felons sitting in Parliament would not unnecessarily encumber the bill; but he trusted that the clauses of the measure would be so concisely framed that as little as possible would be left to the discretion of Ministers of the Crown in carrying out its provisions.

The bill was read a second time and ordered to be referred to a select committee.

The Party Processions (Ireland) Bill was read a second time.

The Medical Acts Amendment Bill was withdrawn on the understanding that a Government Bill would shortly be introduced in the Upper House.

The Attorneys and Solicitors' Remuneration Bill (Committee).—Clause 1.—Sir F. Goldsmid said many members who took an interest in this question had left the House, supposing that a bill of such importance would not be brought on at that time (after 5 o'clock). He, therefore, moved to report progress.—Mr. Hinde Palmer said the hon. and learned member for Richmond (Sir R. Palmer) had gone carefully through the bill and entrusted him with his amendments; the Solicitor-General had also carefully considered the measure, and the bill was regarded by these learned gentlemen as perfectly fair.—The amendment having been withdrawn, Sir F. Goldsmid said this clause raised the whole principle of the bill, and all were interested in having the law officers of the Crown present. He never heard so large a change in the law based upon so slender a ground. It was said it would be easy for attorneys and clients to make their own bargains; but his impression was that it was better to have a fixed scale of charges, and that the plan now proposed would tend very much to the damage of the public and the benefit of the profession.—Mr. Bruce said the bill had been most carefully considered both by the Attorney and Solicitor-General. The clause was agreed to, as were clauses 2, 3, and 4, with some slight amendments. Clause 5.—Sir J. Trelawny moved the addition at the end of the clause of the following proviso:—"Provided always that whenever a solicitor holds deeds or securities on behalf of a client, such solicitor shall not be entitled to retain such deeds or securities until his costs shall be paid."—Mr. Bruce thought that, although the amendment involved a very important question, and one worthy of consideration, it ought not to be accepted without due notice. He would, therefore, suggest that the hon. baronet should defer it till the report.—Sir J. Trelawny said his reason for proposing the amendment was because—as he was informed by a barrister—a solicitor who held a client's title-deeds or securities in a fiduciary capacity was sometimes able to use his possession of them as a sort of screw by which to make the client pay him an unjust bill.—Mr. M'C. Downing said that was quite impossible. By the present law, if a solicitor got the title-deeds of his client as a trustee he held them as a trustee, and if he did business with the client in reference to any particular deed he had a lien on that deed, but on no other, for his costs. The law had been so distinctly laid down on that point that it was unnecessary to argue the question.—Mr. O. Morgan said that if a man delivered a deed to a solicitor in a fiduciary capacity the solicitor would stand in the same position as any other trustee, and would certainly not have a lien on the deed for his charges; but if the deed were delivered to him in the course of his professional business, he would certainly have the right to retain the deed as a guarantee until his charges were paid. In that respect, however, a solicitor only stood in the same position as any trader or artificer in an analogous case. A watchmaker to whom a watch was sent for repair had a right to retain it till his debt was paid; and, again, the person to whom a literary composition was delivered by the author for the purpose of revision had a right to retain the composition until he had been remunerated for his labour.—Mr. Watkin Williams said Sir J. Trelawny had been misled. There was not the slightest pretence for raising any anxiety in the mind of anybody on that question. Deeds delivered to a fiduciary could not be retained as security for a bill, whether such bill was just or unjust. If delivered to a solicitor in the ordinary course of professional business, the solicitor could retain them as a lien for a just bill for work done, and no more. It was long ago decided in the case both of lawyers and of bankers that if documents of value were delivered into professional hands, unless they were delivered upon such terms that it was understood there would be a lien upon them, they must be given up.—Mr. Young pointed out that the lawyer, in fact, did not stand in as good a position as other persons in that matter. The jeweller could detain his customer's watch, and the only remedy the customer had was to bring an action to recover possession; whereas if a solicitor detained his client's deeds the client could get his bill taxed by the Court, and immediately his taxed charges were paid the attorney might be struck off the rolls if he detained the deeds.—Mr. G. Gregory also objected to the amendment on the ground that its principle, if good, would extend to every trade and profession in which the relations of principal and agent existed. The hon. baronet, if he wished to legislate on the matter, should bring in a bill dealing with it generally, and not seek to confine it to a particular class.—Sir J. Trelawny denied the assumed analogy between the position of the solicitor and that of the banker in the case supposed by previous speakers, and asked what the Home Secretary meant by saying—as he did at the beginning of the discussion—that was a very large question, and one well worthy of consideration. Would he deny that there was something in connection with that amendment which really ought to be dealt with?—Mr. Bruce ventured to say that the larger the question the more important it was that notice should be given of the intention to raise it. In the presence of so many learned members he would not presume to offer any opinion of his own as to the necessity of an alteration in the law of lien; but the matter certainly ought not to be dealt with hastily.—Mr. Alderman Lusk complained of the Home Secretary for first acknowledging the importance of the amendment, and then pooh-poohing, and wanting it to be put off till the report—the meaning of which they all knew. He regretted the absence of the law officers of the Crown, and rather distrusted the guidance of hon. and learned gentlemen on a matter in which they were, perhaps, not the most disinterested authorities.—Mr. Hinde Palmer hoped the amendment, which proposed an alteration in a law that had existed for ages and was founded on the soundest principles of equity, would not be pressed at that stage, and that the bill would be allowed to proceed.—The Solicitor-General for Ireland fully agreed with what had fallen from the various learned members who had spoken as to that amendment, which proposed by a sidewind, and without notice to the House or the legal profession, to abolish the entire law of lien as far as solicitors were concerned. He trusted the amendment would be postponed till the report, and then be disposed of in a very summary manner.—Sir J. Trelawny thought it would, perhaps, be beneficial if the further progress of the bill were delayed for two or three days.—Mr. Rathbone said the measure had already been repeatedly postponed, and it was hardly fair to expect it to be put off again. The amendment was then negatived by a majority of 95 to 10, and the clause agreed to. On clause 6, Sir J. Trelawny proposed to add to the end of the clause the following proviso:—"Provided always that every claim of a solicitor shall be recoverable only if made within one year of the time when the work was done in respect to which such claim is made." Mr. Alderman Lusk moved that the Chairman report progress, which was agreed to, and the House resumed.

The Survey of Great Britain, &c., Bill, and the County Courts (Buildings) Bill were read the second time.

The Neutrality Laws.—In reply to Mr. Gregory, Mr. Otway said the Government wished to bring in a bill based on the recent report of the Royal Commission, but it was impossible to deal with so important a subject this session.

The Irish Land Bill—Committee.—Clause 1 reserved.—Mr. Corrance moved an amendment to secure that when the landlord has bought out his tenant's right under the Ulster custom, the holding shall not fall under the provisions of the 3rd clause.—Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chichester Fortescue opposed the amendment, saying that every tenant must be protected either by the Ulster custom or by statute, and wherever the custom is extinguished—no matter by whose act—the tenant must come under clause 3.—Mr. Hardy said that the landlord might have to compensate the tenant twice over.—Mr. Gladstone said under the Equities Clause the Court would prevent any such injustice. Ultimately the amendment was negatived by 133 to 78.—Mr. William Johnston moved an amendment, providing that an Ulster tenant may transfer himself to clause 3 on giving up his rights under the custom. This was accepted by the Government, with the modification that the transfer shall be with the consent of the Court, that the choice once made must be adhered to, and that his holding shall for ever after be taken out of the Ulster custom.—Mr. M'Lagan proposed to add at the end of the clause a provision for the extinction of the Ulster custom by a lease for thirty-one years. The proposal was rejected by a majority of 176 to 140.—Clause 1 was then agreed to, after some abortive deprecatory observations from Mr. Charley. Clause 2, (customs out of Ulster).—Mr. Gladstone proposed to add the following:—"If in the case of any holding not situated in the province of Ulster it shall appear that a usage prevails which in all essential particulars corresponds with the Ulster tenant-right custom, it shall in like manner, and subject to the like conditions, be deemed legal, and shall be in force in manner provided by this Act." After some discussion, progress was reported.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOSEPH PAYNE.

We have to record the death of Mr. Joseph Payne, Deputy-Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions, who expired suddenly on the 29th March, at West-hill, Highgate, aged 73 years. The deceased gentleman was a son of the late William Payne, Esq., by Jane, daughter of Lucy Berry, a descendant of Oliver Cromwell; he was therefore elder brother of Mr. Serjeant Payne, judge of the Southwark Court of Record, and coroner of London and Southwark. Mr. J. Payne was educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, of which institution he was a gentleman commoner; he was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in June, 1825, but afterwards migrated to the Middle Temple. For many years he enjoyed a considerable practice at the Central Criminal Court, and also attended the Westminster and Middlesex Sessions. In May 1859, he was appointed, by Mr. R. Pashley, Q.C., then Assistant Judge of the Court of Sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex, to be Deputy-Assistant Judge of that Court, in succession to Mr. Witham, who had been appointed by Mr. Serjeant Adams, the previous Assistant Judge. Since 1860 Mr. Payne had been deputy to Sir W. H. Bodkin, with whom he resided at Highgate, and continued to discharge his duties at the Clerkenwell Sessions house up to the day previous to his demise.

MR. W. COTHER.

Mr. William Cother, barrister-at-law, expired at Dinan, in France, on the 20th March, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. Mr. Cother was called to the bar at Lincoln's-inn in November, 1840, and formerly practised as a conveyancer on the Oxford Circuit, and at the Gloucester Sessions.

MR. H. H. DIXON.

Mr. Henry Hall Dixon, Barrister-at-Law, died on the 16th March, at Warwick Gardens, Kensington, in the forty-seventh year of his age. Mr. Dixon was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in May 1852, and for some years went the Midland Circuit, also attending the Leicestershire and Northampton sessions, he also more recently practised at the Central Criminal Court. Mr. Dixon was well known in sporting circles as "The Druid," under which cognomen he wrote "Silk and Scarlet," "The Post and the Paddock," "Field and Fern," and "Saddle and Siroloin."

MR. H. C. HERRIES.

Mr. Herbert Crompton Herries, Barrister-at-Law, died at Bonchurch, Isle of Wight, on the 19th March, at the age of forty-three years. He was the eldest son of the late Lieutenant-General Sir William Lewis Herries, C.B. (who was for some time chairman of the Board of Commissioners for auditing the public accounts). His grandfather was the late Colonel Herries, who was among the first to set the example of raising volunteer companies during the last French war; and his uncle was the late Right Hon. J. C. Herries, private secretary to Mr. Perceval during the greater part of his administration. Mr. H. C. Herries was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in June 1856, and had practised as an equity draughtsman and conveyancer.

MR. A. EVANS.

The late Mr. Alfred Evans, solicitor, who died at the Parade, Monmouth, after a short illness, on the 23rd March in his thirty-eighth year, was the younger son of Thomas Evans, Esq., M.D., of Gloucester. He was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term 1855, and was junior partner in the local firm of Powles & Evans.

MR. J. F. CORBETT.

Mr. John Fletcher Corbett, Attorney-at-law, died at Ledbury, Herefordshire, on the 11th March. Mr. Corbett was certificated as a solicitor in Michaelmas Term 1836, and for a long period practised in the city of Worcester, but settled at Ledbury a few years back.

SOCIETIES AND INSTITUTIONS

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

At a meeting of this society held on the 29th March last, Mr. Hargreaves in the chair, the following question was discussed:—"Should the bill introduced by the Government relative to the tenure of land in Ireland become law?" The debate was opened by Mr. Warrington in the affirmative, and, after an animated discussion, was decided by the society in the same view by a majority of twelve to one. Mr. W. Appleton was elected to the vacant post of Honorary Secretary. The number of members present was twenty-three.

ARTICLED CLERKS' SOCIETY.

A meeting of this society was held in the Hall of the Honourable Society of Clement's inn, Clement's-inn, Strand, on Wednesday last, at 7 p.m. The chair was taken by Mr. J. C. Barnard. Mr. Plant moved—"That a national system of compulsory secular education would not at present be in accordance with the requirements of society." The motion was fully discussed by a large number of members, and, on being put by the president, was lost by a majority of six.

Messrs. Debenham, Storr & Sons, of the Great Metropolitan Auction Mart in Covent-garden, announce by circular that Mr. Puttick, auctioneer, late of No. 47, Leicester-square, this day joins their firm as partner.

Mr. F. D. Chauntrell, the newly-appointed Government solicitor at Calcutta, has reached that city from Bombay, and has been admitted as an attorney of the High Court of Bengal. Mr. F. R. Stack's resignation of the solicitorship has been gazetted.

By the death of Mr. Henry Coppock, solicitor, of Stockport, Cheshire, the following local offices have become vacant:—Town Clerk of Stockport, Clerk to the Borough and County Justices, Registrar of the County Court, Clerk to Heaton Morris Petty Sessions, and Clerk to the Burial Board.

Mr. George Warner Lawton, solicitor, of Eye, in Suffolk, who had resigned the office of Town Clerk, has been elected an alderman of that borough, in the place of Mr. Fleuer, retired. Mr. Lawton was certificated as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1829, and is a member of the local firm of French & Lawton.

SENIOR WRANGLERS.—In 1761 we have the first senior wrangler proclaimed by the foot-notices to have arrived at judicial honours. This was Wilson of Peterhouse, who became a judge of the Common Pleas. Two years later the great Paley is senior wrangler. In 1772 we find the double names (with a bracket, calculated to mislead) of Prettyman (Tomlins), both signifying a well-known Bishop of Winchester in his day. Soon we have the excellent Milner, President of Queen's, and afterwards Dean of Carlisle. In 1787 we have Littledale, the famous judge, who with Tenterden as chief, and Bailey and Holroyd as fellow pupils, made what was called "the golden era of the King's Bench." Copley, afterwards Lord Lyndhurst, comes in as second wrangler in 1794, distanced by Butler, formerly a famous head-master of Harrow. In 1799 Lord Chief Justice Tindal shows as a good wrangler and senior medallist, and next year Vice-Chancellor Shadwell is a good wrangler and second medallist. The great lawyers are plentiful between 1806 and 1810. Sir Frederick Pollock, the Lord Chief Baron, is senior wrangler; Bickersteth, afterwards Lord Langdale, who refused the seals, the brother of the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, and uncle of the Bishop of Ripon, is also senior wrangler; and so are those distinguished judges Alderson and Maule. In 1812 Rolfe is the last of the wranglers, or golden spoon, as it is sometimes called, but he gets his Fellowship at Trinity, and becomes Lord Chancellor. The year but one after, another eminent judge, the late Sir Cresswell Cresswell, was "wooden spoon," the last of the junior optimes. Other eminent judges high among the wranglers were Alvanley, Ellenborough, Lawrence, Lens, Parke, Kindersley, Coltman, W. P. Wood, Cleasby, Blackburn. In 1824 the classical tripos is instituted, and henceforth all double honours, besides the medals, are duly registered. Among the senior wranglers we naturally meet with men of world-wide scientific attainments, some of them mathematical professors in the University—Herschel, Ellis, Stokes, Cayley, Adams, Airey, Challis. The illustrious Whewell missed the senior's place and came out second. Seven senior wranglers have become bishops, but bishops and great divines abound in the wranglers' list, and generally range high up. Canon Melvill, Mr. Birks, Bishop Goodwin, and Bishop Colenso were respectively second wranglers. One senior wrangler a few years ago, was drowned soon after his attainment of the honour, on the very day on which he was to sit for a Trinity Fellowship. The senior wrangler of last year, Mr. Hartog, is a Jew, and a special grace was granted by the Senate to enable him to be admitted to his degree. He has since received an appointment in the Foreign Office.—Leisure Hour.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY INTELLIGENCE.

A strong demand for money early in the week caused the funds to recede a trifle. The demand subsequently abating, they have established a further advance. Railways began heavily, but are now firm. The foreign market has been strong throughout the week. The proceedings on behalf of the Erie Protective Committee were to commence this week at New York. Meanwhile an agent of Messrs. Fisk & Gould has, it is stated, been despatched to London on some occult mission.

It is stated that the liabilities of Mr. Wm. Cotterill, of Cotterill & Sons, solicitors, Throgmorton-street, who suddenly disappeared last week, amount to upwards of £100,000.

The fifteenth annual meeting of the Law Union Fire and Life Insurance Company was held on Thursday. The report stated that in the fire department 5,276 new policies had been issued during the year ending 30th November last, yielding in premiums £6,775 0s. 8d., and in the life department 309 new policies, insuring £263,490, yielding in premiums £9,902 5s. 9d., and that the assets of the company amounted to £293,076 14s. 7d. A dividend and bonus together of twelve per cent. on the paid-up capital was declared.

The Monte Albo Mining Company (Limited) has been formed to purchase and further develop the silver lead mines known as Guzurra and Su-Ergielu, situate in the commune of Lula, district of Nuoro, province of Sassari, Island of Sardinia, held under a concession of the King of Italy, which gives the right of working the minerals in perpetuity (free of royalty or any payment except export duty). The capital to be raised is £100,000., in 20,000 shares of £5 each, £1 being payable on application, and £4 on allotment, of which 12,800 are to be A shares, to bear a preferential dividend of £15 per cent. per annum, and 7,200 are to be B shares, which are to take a dividend of 15 per cent. per annum, if such is earned after A shares have received 15 per cent., and which are taken by the vendors in part payment of the purchase-money, which is placed at £86,000, the fully paid-up B shares representing £36,000, therefore £50,000 is to be paid in cash. The remainder of net returns available for dividend over 15 per cent. on both A and B shares respectively, and the payment of £1 per ton royalty on ores sold, is to be further equally divided.

The prospectus of the Tuolumne Gold Mining Company (Limited) has been issued: capital £80,000, in 40,000 shares of £2 each. The property is situated in the county Tuolumne, in the state of California, about eleven miles from Sonora. Applications for shares will not be received after the 6th inst.

The prospectus of the Metropolitan Public Carriage and Repository Company (Limited), has been issued, with a capital of £150,000, in 100,000 fully paid-up shares of £1 each; 2s. 6d. to be paid on application; 2s. 6d. on allotment; and the remaining 15s. to be paid by three instalments of 5s. each, at intervals of two months; with power to issue debentures for £50,000. Share warrants to bearer will be issued at option of applicant. Interest at the rate of 5 per cent. will be allowed to shareholders who pay in full upon their shares.

Mr. J. E. Poole, coroner of Bridgwater, in Somersetshire, died on the 19th March.

The office of Queen's Advocate at Sierra Leone is vacant, in consequence of the appointment of Mr. George Philippo to be Attorney-General of British Columbia. The vacant office is worth £800 per annum.

Mr. Francis Woolnough, of Eye, Suffolk, has been elected Town Clerk of that borough, in the room of Mr. G. W. Lawton, solicitor, resigned. Mr. Woolnough has performed the duties of Town Clerk for nineteen years, under the supervision of Mr. Lawton, as his deputy.

At Liverpool the other day the assignees of a bankrupt, who claimed to recover £70 10s., were non-suited by Brett J., on the ground that the payment of the sum to the defendant's cashier had been bona fide, and that the notice of assignment had only appeared in the London Gazette, and not also in a London daily paper.

Mr. John Thomas Graves, Barrister-at-Law, has resigned the office of Poor Law Inspector, which he has held under the Poor Law Board for a period of twenty-four years. Mr. Graves was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in June, 1831.

Illinois judges have decided that bets can be recovered of stakeholders by winning parties.

A recent number of the Canada Law Journal has the following odd announcement:—"Mr. Spragge has been offered and has accepted the Chancellorship, and that Mr. Strong has been appointed one of the Vice-Chancellors." Is this a misprint or an expression of opinion? The italics are ours.

LONDON, APRIL 9, 1870.

WE PRINT THIS WEEK the Rules issued under the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act, 1869. We believe that these are not the only rules which may be expected under the legislation of last session. The General Orders issued under the Bankruptcy Act were, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, prepared by a single authority, and are applicable to all courts alike having jurisdiction under the Act. But with the Debtors Act it is otherwise. Under it rules for the superior courts of law were framed by the judges of those courts; Orders for the Court of Chancery by the Chancellor, with the usual advice and assistance; and Rules for the county courts by the Rule Committee of Judges. And as the Act gives room for much difference of opinion as to its construction, there is not unnaturally much discordance between these various codes of rules. Much uncertainty and no small inconvenience, has hence arisen; and we believe that some at least of these rules are likely to be at once modified with a view to securing greater uniformity of procedure.

THE EXTREMELY UNSATISFACTORY CONDITION into which capital punishment has got in this country, owing to the arbitrary and uncertain way in which the Royal prerogative of mercy has been exercised, is an evil calling emphatically for a remedy. We doubt, however, whether the Bill to "provide a Court of Appeal for persons convicted of capital offences in certain cases" will, even if it becomes law, supply a satisfactory remedy. The bill provides for an appeal if the judge who tried the case certifies that an appeal is necessary, which he is to do if satisfied by affidavits that some facts tending to prove insanity or to exculpate the prisoner have been discovered since the verdict. When the appeal is thus certified, a statement of the same, with the grounds thereof, is to be lodged with the judge and forwarded by him to the Home Secretary, who is thereupon to summon the Court of Appeal; this Court is to consist of six common law judges and six members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, nominated annually by the Home Secretary and the Chief Judges of the Supreme Courts of Common Law; three judges and three members of the Judicial Committee to be the quorum, with power to take evidence orally or by way of affidavit. The Court is to report to her Majesty as to a free pardon or commutation of sentence, but the jurisdiction of the Court is not to affect the Royal prerogative of mercy.

The bill may or may not pass the House of Commons, but it does not seem likely that it will pass the Lords; for the subject with which the bill deals was discussed by the House of Lords on Monday last. The initiative was taken by Lord Penzance, who moved for "a return of the criminal sentences which had been wholly remitted or reduced or varied by the Crown with the advice of the Home Secretary during the last three years," and in so doing advocated the establishment of such a tribunal as that proposed by the bill, and the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole subject. But the Earl of Morley, the Duke of Richmond, and the Lord Chancellor were all opposed to the establishment of a court such as that proposed, and in fact to any alteration of the existing system, so that Lord Penzance withdrew his motion.

We are disposed to concur with Lord Penzance in thinking that the establishment of some court of appeal would be beneficial, because, as its proceedings would be public, the true grounds of the commutation or confirmation of any sentence of capital punishment would be known, whereas now the public are quite in the dark what motives or reasons have influenced the Home Secretary in any given case.

THE CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS for bribery at the Bridgewater and Norwich elections, which have been lately concluded, have raised several points of law, one of the most important of which we noticed last week (ante 447). These proceedings have, however, more than a mere legal interest, and are of great general importance. They are the fitting sequel to the commissions for inquiry into the corrupt practices that existed at the elections in 1868. The same kind of evidence is given on the criminal trial as before the commissioners; and public opinion is most lenient as regards the disclosures made in that evidence. In fact, there is no doubt that a most unsatisfactory state of electoral corruption has been proved to exist, but no means have yet been discovered for remedying the evil. The late trials show that the present law, as it is practically administered, will cause but little alteration in the mode in which elections have hitherto been conducted.

The trial of Messrs. Vanderbyl and Fenelly at Taunton is one of several instances of the indulgent way in which corrupting electors is too generally viewed. An information was filed against the defendants for bribery and for conspiring to bribe at the election for Bridgewater in 1868. Mr. Vanderbyl was acquitted, on the ground that there was no satisfactory evidence against him. Mr. Fenelly was found guilty, but curiously enough he was found guilty with extenuating circumstances. It is difficult to understand a verdict of this sort. It is easy to imagine circumstances which might mitigate very much the offence of receiving a bribe to vote at an election, as, for instance, great poverty. But unless under some very extraordinary circumstances, which do not seem to have existed here, the crime of giving bribes can hardly be committed under extenuating circumstances.

There is, however, no doubt that this particular crime is not viewed with that repugnance with which most other crimes are regarded, and spite of the statutes punishing bribery the offence will not be repressed in any effectual manner until this feeling on the part of the public alters.

In those cases in which the defendants have been convicted in the late trials for bribery at Bridgewater and Norwich sentences have not been passed, but have been reserved for the Court of Queen's Bench. We await with some curiosity the result of the decision of the Court as to the amount of punishment which is to be awarded to those who have been thus found guilty, and we hope that the Court will show as clearly as they can that the law for repressing corrupt practices at elections is not a mere name but is a reality, and that it will be put in full force whenever it lies in the power of the Court to do so. Judicial decisions have often a considerable effect in helping to form public opinion, and in these cases the power thus possessed by the bench might be most beneficially exercised in these cases.

WE IMAGINE that almost any English lawyer, if asked whether steam tugs, engaged in towing vessels up and down a river, are common carriers as regards such vessels, would answer in the negative. There seems, however, to be no direct English authority for that opinion, although there are decisions which support it by implication. In America, on the other hand, the question has frequently arisen, and all the cases on the subject have lately been reviewed in an elaborate judgment in Brown v. Clegget, in the Supreme Court at Philadelphia. The decision is that steam tugs towing boats on rivers are not common carriers. It is difficult to imagine that any other decision could have been arrived at, and the wonder is that there should be any doubt on the point. In America all sorts of unreportable cases seem to be habitually reported. The extraordinary liabilities of common carriers, even if reasonable in former days, are now often the cause of much inconvenience.

There is little but authority and precedent to recommend the present state of the law, and is much to be said in favour of relieving carriers from their present liability as insurers and still more against increasing the number of classes to whom that liability now extends.

THE LAND TRANSFER BILL.

It is now several years since an Act was passed which, as was then hoped and dreaded, was to revolutionise the law and practice of conveyancing in England, an Act which was heralded with a flourish of trumpets such as has seldom been blown in Parliament, and opposed on the part of a numerous body of the profession with an eagerness which showed how nearly they expected it to touch their prospects. The Act passed however, and the proverbial result has followed, save only that in this case the mouse has been so very diminutive that it requires a very close observation indeed to see it at all. We ventured at the time to predict that the Act would have a very limited operation; that a few proprietors, who desired to sell in building lots might perhaps register as a preliminary step; but that the inherent evils of the registration system and the great expenses necessarily connected with registration would effectually deter the vast majority of landowners from making any use of the Act.

That measure then having practically failed, we are now threatened with another, which seems to us simply designed as a cloak for the former, so as, by supplying some work for the office of Land Registry, to disguise the completeness of the failure. The general scheme of this bill may be described as registration without an indefeasible title—i.e., registration with all its attendant disadvantages and expenses, and without the only compensating consideration hitherto offered. If this bill were, like the former, permissive merely, it would not be hard to predict its fate, and few as have been the instances of registration under Lord Westbury's Act, fewer still might be expected to follow from the bill before us. But the 45th clause proposes, after a short interval, to make registration compulsory upon every sale of the fee simple. Remembering the fate of the statutes of uses and inrolments, the obstinate determination of the British owner, on the one hand, not to disclose his dealings with his land, and the untiring ingenuity of conveyancers on the other, ever ready to devise new plans for accommodating his fancy, we do not doubt that even this provision, should it unhappily pass into law, may and will be successfully evaded. Indeed, we see but little difficulty in doing so by means of the machinery provided by the bill itself, but we do not consider it necessary or advisable to disclose the modus operandi in these columns, at all events at present.

We do not propose in this article to examine the provisions of the bill in detail. Where the principle of a measure is so open to objection as we think this to be, details are comparatively unimportant, but we may remark that this bill is open to the same observation which we have thought it necessary to make with reference to so many other measures introduced in the last and present sessions of Parliament, viz.—that it is in great part a bill giving power to make statutory general rules. The practical result of this is, of course, to give, at least at first, until the rules come to be settled and understood, a great spur to litigation, and should the Act ever come to be extensively used it will almost to a certainty have this effect.

The 31st section adds another to the many futile attempts which have been made to get rid of equitable estates—attempts which, if they succeeded, could only have the effect of covering and legalising frauds. The well-known doctrine of equity in favour of purchasers for value without notice is sufficient to cover every honest case; if the operation of the Act does no more than this the proposal is nugatory, if it does more (and we fear that a wider scope may be given to it if only in order that it may have some operation) it can only be to protect purchasers who either are not perfectly honest or have been culpably incautious.

We are at a loss to reconcile the 45th section, which provides for compulsory registration on every sale, with the 60th, which prevents the registration of two or more persons as tenants in common; at least we can hardly suppose that the Act intends by a side wind to abolish tenancies in common altogether, and force all owners of undivided shares to partition or sale; still less can we believe that all such owners are to be beneficiaries merely, and compelled to register in the name of a trustee, especially when we read that "no notice of any trust, implied, express, or constructive, shall be receivable by the registrar or entered upon the register."

The 61st section appears to us to confer upon the Court a very dangerous discretion. After providing in effect for the validity of such conditions as were established in Tulk v. Moshay and that class of cases, it proceeds to confer on the Court power to do away with any such condition, not upon the consent of the covenantees, but if the Court shall think it for their interest to do so, however much they may object. As long as the covenantees are sui juris this is probably of no consequence; nothing is more unlikely than that the Court, should at the instance of the covenantor, relax such a condition against the will of a covenantee able but unwilling to consent; but in the case of infants or married women, when the enforcement of the condition acts to their pecuniary disadvantage, the Court might, and not unfrequently would, however anxious they might be to keep up the restriction, relax it of its own mere motion. The infant might be over twenty years of age, amply provided for, and having some ground, sentimental or other, operating very powerfully to urge him to continue the restriction, yet the Court might relax it in spite of his wishes, merely to put money in his purse which he neither asked for nor needed.

The provision respecting judicial sales might, with some modification, be made the basis of useful legislation, and section 15 in particular contains the germ of a valuable amendment of the law. But to our mind the best provision in the whole bill is the one empowering the Treasury to close the existing registries in Middlesex and Yorkshire; and if Parliament would extend section 109 to Ireland, amend section 15 by providing for a day for absent parties to show cause, and leave out the other 107 sections altogether, they would, in our opinion, confer a benefit on the community.

The truth is, that registration, as proposed by this Act, is not the appropriate remedy for the evils of the existing law of conveyancing. Mr. Dix Hutton some time since pointed out that remedy, and although we believe that his Record of Title Act has not hitherto met with the success which it deserves, it is not the less clear that by such a process as there provided, and such only, can the evils of complication of title be effectually avoided. Some idea of such a record of title seems to have been floating in the brain of the draftsmen to whom the preparation of this bill was intrusted, but either he had not sufficient insight into the difference between that and registration, or he was too much hampered by his instructions to be able properly to carry out the idea. The essence of a record of title, as we understand it, is that no devolution of any kind, with the simple exceptions hereafter mentioned, is ever to appear upon the record. Upon every transaction affecting the inheritance, whether by conveyance, devise, or otherwise, a fresh record is to be made out, showing precisely the then state of the title, with all equitable estates, &c., fully disclosed, and with proper references to leases, charges, and other incumbrances not forming part of the title to the fee simple (the details of which appear by themselves), but without any trace of the previous history of the title other than the reference to the folio containing the last preceding record.

This system, at once simple and effectual, completely does away with cautions, notices, inhibitions, and all the other machinery involved in the futile idea of keeping the beneficial title off the register, while it presents at any moment, and at a bird's-eye view, the exact state of the title to any given parcel of land.

The only exceptions to the rule are—1st, where the record shows successive estates, the determination or other extinction of any of these estates is shown by an entry in the margin without a fresh record; and 2ndly, where an estate in fee simple or fee tail is suffered to descend without disturbance the descent is simply noted at the foot of the record. It is obvious that neither of these exceptions in the slightest degree infringes the principle of the system.

The only difficulties, so far as we are aware, connected with this plan of record are two, both of which are equally incident to the plan of registration—1st, to get the property recorded in the first instance; and 2ndly, to keep the record properly indexed.

In South Australia, where, as we are informed, the system has been perfectly successful, the first difficulty did not exist, because, as all the land in the colony was held directly from the Crown under recent grants, it was easy to get a proper entry of every title; but the second difficulty is one inherent in every system of public record, and can only be met by some well-arranged plan of index of places—no index of persons being of the slightest use; regard being had to the fact, too often overlooked in considering this question, that it can never be assumed that any other land can be an equivalent for that which is the subject of the investigation.

The materials for such an index are, in England, in course of being supplied by means of the new Ordnance maps on the six inch scale; these maps will admit of every tenement, however small (except houses in towns), being denoted by a figure on the map, and on reference to that figure in the index, the required folio of the record should be found. Houses in towns would, of course, have to be indexed somewhat differently, but in that case no difficulty whatever could arise.

No system of consecutive registration whether of deeds or of ownerships, can ever supply all the requisites of a perfect abstract of title, and a register not showing the beneficial ownership, which has, therefore, to be guarded by an elaborate system of notices, is for many purposes worse than no register at all. The history of the Middlesex Register, as recorded in the reports, is full of warning on this head, and it would not be perhaps too much to say that for one case where that register has prevented a fraud, there are ten where it has been made the instrument of injustice, and a thousand where it has operated simply as a useless expense.

We sincerely trust that this bill may not be permitted to become law, believing that its operation would be simply to prop up a deserved failure, and to place a serious impediment in the way of the adoption of a satisfactory and philosophical system of conveyancing.

The Lord Chancellor has acceded to the memorial of the local authorities at the port of Hartlepool, by conferring admiralty jurisdiction on the county court of that borough.

The United States Supreme Court has decided that Congress has no constitutional power to establish police regulations within the States.

Out of 504 cases brought before the Superior Court of Maine, in six terms, only 99 went to a jury; that is, the litigants preferred the decision of a judge in 405 cases.

RECENT DECISIONS.

COMMON LAW.

TAXATION OF COSTS—ALLOWANCE OF TWO COUNSEL—COMMISSION—DISCRETION OF MASTER.

Frost v. London, Brighton, & South Coast Railway Company, Ex., 18 W. R. 351; Sinclair v. Great Eastern Railway Company, C.P., 18 W. R. 491; Yglesias v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, C.P., 18 W. R. 381.

There have been lately several decisions which have involved a discussion of the principles which should guide the masters on taxation of costs in allowing or disallowing counsels' fees. The general result of these late cases is that the master is to use his discretion as to the number of counsel whose fees ought to be allowed, and that there is no inflexible rule on this subject. Also that the Courts reserved to themselves the rights of superintending this discretion; but in all ordinary cases where the master has acted on a correct principle the Courts will be slow to interfere with the exercise of his discretion unless a strong case for doing so is made out.

In Frost v. The London, Brighton &c. Company, the master allowed the fees of two counsel for the plaintiff on a writ of inquiry to assess compensation, and the Court refused to interfere, as it appeared that the master had inquired into the matter and had exercised his discretion, and not acted on any fixed rule.

In Sinclair v. The Great Eastern Railway Company, the master allowed the fees of only one counsel for the plaintiff in a very important arbitration. He refused to allow two counsel because he thought that there was an inflexible rule of practice to that effect. The Court held that there was no inflexible rule on the subject, and directed the taxation of this part of the costs to be reviewed, that the master might have an opportunity of exercising his discretion in the matter. The Court explain also that Harkins v. Rigby (8 C. B. N. S. 271), by which the master appears to have considered himself bound to allow only one counsel under any circumstances, does not lay down any inflexible rule on the point. It is important to remember this, as the case affords good ground for the construction apparently put upon it by the master.

In Yglesias v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, the master allowed the fees and expenses of sending out an English barrister on a commission to examine witnesses abroad, and the Court, acting on the principle of the other two cases we have noticed, refused to review the taxation.

These three decisions may be usefully read together as they all follow the same principle, and at the same time afford illustrations of the manner in which that principle will be applied.

NEGLIGENCE—BAILMENT—GLANDERED HORSE.

Penton v. Murdock, Ex. 18 W. R. 382.

In the absence of any special contract every bailor is bound to use reasonable care of the goods delivered to him, and if he is guilty of negligence which causes damage to the goods bailed he is liable to the bailor. There is on the other hand a correlative duty on the part of the bailor towards the bailee that the bailor on his part will not be negligent towards the bailee. Farrant v. Barnes (31 L. J. C. P. 137), is a good instance of this.

There the defendant sent nitric acid by a carrier without taking reasonable care that the carrier and his servants should know its dangerous nature, and it was held that the defendant was liable for damage caused by the acid to the plaintiff, one of the carrier's servants, in consequence of the plaintiff's ignorance of the dangerous character of the acid.

This seems to be the principle of the decision in Penton v. Murdock, although it is not so stated. The declaration alleged that the defendant had a horse which he knew to be glandered, and he gave the horse to the plaintiff, who was ignorant that the horse was glandered, to be kept by the plaintiff for the defendant in a stable with a horse of the plaintiff's, and that the plaintiff's horse caught the glanders in consequence and died. The plaintiff, on motion for arrest of judgment, was held entitled to recover as a breach of duty by the defendant, and damage thereby to the plaintiff was shown in the action. The only case cited was Hill v. Ball (5 W. R. 740) which had very little resemblance to the present one except in the fact that it was the sale of a glandered horse that gave rise to the action. The two cases were clearly distinguishable, and the decision of Penton v. Murdock was not governed in any way by that of Hill v. Ball.

REVIEWS.

Personal Sketches of his own Times. By Sir JONAH BARRINGTON, Member of the Irish Parliament, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland, and Author of "The Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation." Third Edition, with a Memoir of the Author, an Essay on Irish Wit and Humour, and Notes and Corrections. By TOWNSEND YOUNG, LL.D. London: Routledge & Sons.

It is now forty years since the last edition of Sir Jonah Barrington's Personal Sketches made its appearance. To the present generation the new edition is almost a new work. Those who have not read it have a treat before them, for it is certainly one of the most entertaining works ever written. Written with genuine Irish humour and naïveté it affords an insight into the Irish life and character of the close of the last and the beginning of the present century, peculiarly apropos at the present moment. Sir Jonah Barrington was born in 1760, of a family which had held land in Queen's County since the days of Queen Elizabeth. He was called to the bar in 1787, became a King's counsel in 1793, and judge of the Admiralty Court in 1798. In 1830 he was dismissed the Bench for serious misconduct in his judicial capacity, nothing short of misappropriating to his own use moneys paid into court. He died abroad a couple of years later. The limits of Sir Jonah's Sketches thus include some very stirring times in Ireland, in addition to which his narration is carried one or two generations back into the days of barbarism. It would be impossible to convey any adequate idea of the contents of this most amusing book except by printing lengthy extracts for which we have no space. We may, however, detail at second-hand a couple of Sir Jonah's stories. This is what took place during an assize case in which some members of the Barrington family were interested:—

"On the evening of the trial my second brother, Henry French Barrington, a gentleman of considerable estate, of good temper, but irresistible impetuosity, came to me. He was a complete country gentleman, utterly ignorant of the law, its terms and proceedings; and as I was the first of my name who had ever followed any profession, the army excepted, my opinion, so soon as I became a counsellor, was considered by him as oracular. Having called me aside out of the bar-room, my brother seemed greatly agitated, and informed me that a friend of ours, who had seen the jury list, declared that it had been decidedly packed! He asked me what he ought to do. I told him we should have 'challenged the array.' 'That was my own opinion, Jonah,' said he 'and I will do it now!'

"He said no more, but departed instantly, and I did not think again upon the subject. An hour after, however, my brother sent in a second request to see me. I found him, to all appearances, quite cool and tranquil. 'I have done it,' cried he, exultingly, 'twas better late than never,' and with that he produced from his coat pocket a long queue and a handful of powdered hair and curls. 'See here!' continued he, 'the cowardly rascal!'

"'Heavens!' cried I, 'French, are you mad?'

"'Mad!' replied he, 'no no! I followed your own advice exactly. I went directly after I left you to the grand jury-room to 'challenge the array,' and there I challenged the head of the array, that cowardly Lyons! He peremptorily refused to fight me, so I knocked him down before the grand jury and cut off his curls and tail; see, here they are, the rascal, and my brother Jack is gone to flog the sheriff.'"

Of Sir Boyle Roche Sir Jonah writes (inter alia) as follows:—

"He was a determined enemy to the French revolution, and seldom rose in the House for several years without volunteering some abuse of it. 'Mr. Speaker,' said he, in a mood of this kind, 'if we once permitted the villainous French masons to meddle with the buttresses and walls of our ancient constitution, they would never stop nor stay, sir, till they brought the foundation-stones tumbling down about the ears of the nation! There,' continued Sir Boyle, placing his hand earnestly on his heart, his powdered head shaking in unison with his loyal zeal, whilst he described the probable consequences of an invasion of Ireland by the French Republicans, 'There, Mr. Speaker! if those Gallican villains should invade us, sir, 'tis on that very table, maybe, these honourable members might see their own destinies lying in heaps a-top of one another! Here, perhaps, sir, the murderous marshal-law-men (Marseillois) would break in, cut us to mince-meat, and throw our bleeding heads upon that table to stare us in the face!' Sir Boyle, on another occasion was arguing for the Habeas Corpus Suspension Bill in Ireland—'It would surely be better, Mr. Speaker,' said he, 'to give up not only a part, but, if necessary, even the whole, of our constitution, to preserve the remainder!'"
